There is a probability, however, that the Germans may not intend to stand on this line, but rather launch a great offensive to the westward therefrom, since, having achieved the desired effect of drawing the Allies from their trenches and bringing them out in the open, every good military reason seems to exist which would justify the Germans in taking the chances of a great battle in the open. Their British opponents they regard as almost entirely a freshly raised army, whose officers and men were trained practically entirely for trench fighting, and have had no experience in open fighting. Besides this, the Germans have the advantage of a fortified base line on which to fall back in case of defeat, which their opponents have not, nor can they construct one under three or four months. This opinion is also confirmed by the fact that cavalry fighting has begun along the whole line in the past few days, being the first time that cavalry has been used on the western front since 1914. Now, as cavalry operations always precede a great battle and form a screen behind which the infantry get into position for the battle, it hardly seems probable that the Germans would have thrown cavalry forward unless they intended an infantry offensive. So it seems quite probable that in the next ten days or so one of the greatest battles of the war will be fought in these regions.

On the rest of the western front during the past week the activity has been largely confined to trench raids of no particular importance or significance.

The German report of the torpedoing of the French battleship Danton, 18,028 tons displacement, in the Mediterranean on March 20 is confirmed, Paris reporting the loss of 296 of her crew of 1,102.

One of the mysteries of the ocean of recent days has been solved by the official announcement from Germany that for the second time the auxiliary cruiser Moewe has successfully reached a home port after a cruise of several months in the Atlantic, during which she captured twenty-two steamers and five sailing vessels, aggregating 123,000 gross tons. The Moewe returned to port with 600 prisoners, of whom fifty-seven were Americans from the British horse transport Esmeraldas.

The situation in Russia seems, from such fragments of news as we have, to be growing worse with considerable rapidity. The enthusiasm of the first days is over, and the food rushed up from nearby places to Petrograd by the provisional government has been eaten, and that, as well as other economic problems, is now growing pressing. Moreover, the disorganization which always follows great political upheavals of a revolutionary character is apparently having its effect not only on the soldiery but on all classes of society. The arrest of the Czar and Czarina is confirmed, and Grand Duke Nicholas is on his way to the capital from the Caucasus.

Some newspapers are openly advocating a republic of a very radical character. The number of killed in the last week of the revolutionary struggle is now said to have been about 4,000, while the wounded are said to number 7,000; hence the revolution was not the comparatively bloodless affair we were first given to understand. It seems now that the loyalty of the army on the northern front to the new government is by no means assured, though the armies on the western and southern fronts seem to have given enthusiastic approval to the upheaval. The southern army, it may be noted, was under the command of Grand Duke Nicholas. One thing may be said almost with certainty; the Russian armies will not display much offensive power until after the constitutional convention when the government, whatever form it may take, is fully organized. This convention apparently it is not the intention of the temporary government to assemble for some time, perhaps not for six months.

Late reports from Petrograd indicated that the new Russian Government had information regarding great concentrations of men and material being made by the Germans on the northern front. The official announcement declared, "The enemy is menacing the capital from two directions. First, he is concentrating continually on our northern front great quantities of munitions, supplies and men. Second, he is concentrating his spies in Petrograd. Steps against the latter are an immediate necessity. General Korniloff, the new commander of the Petrograd district was reported in conference with the workingmen's councils and with delegates from the soldiers, planning with them measures to meet this threat. Plans were also said to be in process of formation for the moving of the capital to the ancient capital of Moscow.

The food question is admitted to be pressing on Great Britain with daily increasing stringency. Unofficially it is said that the government intends shortly to enforce two meatless and two potatoless days, and to limit the allowance of meat per person to five ounces of uncooked meat per meal.

can keep up even the leisurely pace to which they are accustomed for any long period.

Labor is cheap and of low efficiency. In the Ashio Copper Mines, in a district where labor is cheap and machinery expensive, machines are being introduced as rapidly as possible because of their greater reliability and productivity. This is a bad omen for the Japanese laborer. When labor at twenty cents a day cannot compete with machinery which has to be produced by highly paid mechanics in Europe or America, the industrial revolution which is sure to come is certain to cause misery among the laboring classes by driving them out of work, or causing them to "speed up" to a degree which their bodies will not stand. In spite of the high state of industry in Japan, the Japanese workman is ill fitted to "speeding up" and efficiency methods. He shines at painstaking, patient, go-as-you-please methods, and not in high-speed production.

Two of the superintendents, who showed me around, had studied in America and testified to the courtesy with which they were treated by mine-owners and experts there.

I asked one polite and well-informed man why mine owners who were amassing wealth at a rate which he confessed amounted to $14,000 a day, did not increase the wages more rapidly. He dodged the question by answering that he thought that Japanese and American wages were becoming more nearly equal. The family system is so strong in Japan that when a man loses a factory position he returns to the farm or home industry of his family, and does not herd in masses, whose weapon is the strike. Japanese laborers have not yet developed a class consciousness, and in a land where the wealthy are very wealthy, and where extreme poverty is uncommon, the ordinary laborer is very poorly paid. He has not yet learned how to cooperate to secure a fairer division of profits.

The copper company maintains a well-equipped hospital and two schools, while the municipality supports one smaller school. One of the company schools has 1,200 pupils, and stands high among educational institutions of the district. Here is an unusually liberal company, whose ideas of relief methods and compensation are in advance of the general state of the art, but no American laborer would tolerate such conditions of time, pay or housing.

One incident especially impressed me as I left the sometimes dangerous path along the steep mountainsides cut by landslides, and climbed to the level place on which the first of the three mining villages stood. A group of young boys in paper hats and with wooden guns had stacked their weapons in regulation style and were resting from the war game as I approached. When they saw me, they came in a flock to look me over and see what the black thing was that I carried in my hand. Singling out a small lad of ten who seemed to be the captain, I pointed out a straight line, shouldered an imaginary rifle, looked straight ahead and said in my best Michigan National Guard tone of voice, "Atten-shun!" The boy understood. Turning to that motley herd of curious kids, he spoke about three words in Japanese. There was a rush to the stacked guns, a raising of the tiny flag, a lining up that was a marvel of speed and precision and I snapped a picture of those tiny lads, just as they lined up according to the orders of their young leader, in less than half a minute. I defy any American Boy Scout troop of equally young boys, equally curious to see what a foreigner is doing, to get such results with such ease and lack of shouting or shoving. The spirit of 1895, 1904 and 1914 breathes in the youngest Japanese lad.

Sixteen miles in four and a quarter hours, the last 2.4 miles in twenty-eight minutes, brought me back over another beautiful pass to the welcome hot tub, the clean clothes, the excellently served dinner, and, best of all, the mail from home.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

IT is fitting that in this Easter week we should remember the resurrection, for had there been no resurrection there would have been no thousands of earnest people praying in full assurance. Let us thank God this week for a risen Saviour, and let us pray for a resurrection in our own hearts, for a new awakening of love for him and of charity for our neighbors, and for a new willingness to serve in his name. Let us pray also for a resurrection in the spiritual life of the nation. Much that we deplore is due to the obliteration of spiritual values by visions of commercial advantage. Greed for gain, lust for power, pride of position, these have rolled a stone before the sepulcher of truth. Let us pray that, on this Easter morning, we in America may awake to a new appreciation of our Christian obligations and opportunities, and that, with Christian living and Christian evangelism, our nation may be prepared to lead the nations of the world toward the peace of righteousness, the only peace that can endure.

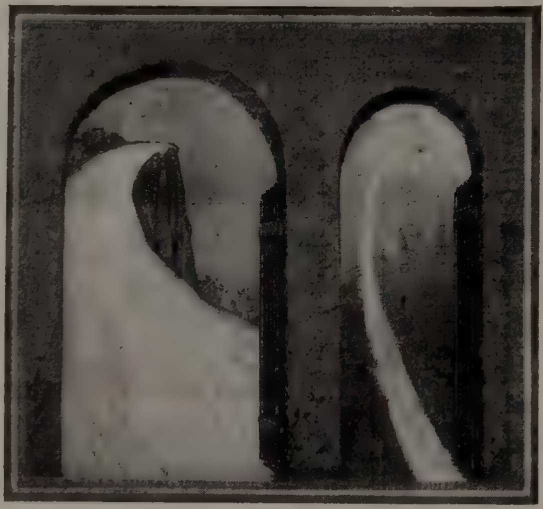
PARENTS, I urge you to make the Bible the sweetest, the dearest book to your children; not by compelling them to read so many chapters each day, which will have the effect of making them hate the Bible, but by reading its pages, with them, and by your tender parental love, so showing them the beauty of its wondrous incidents, from the story of Adam and Eve to the story of Bethlehem and Calvary, that no book in the home will be so dear to your children as the Bible; and thus you will be strengthening their minds with the sublimest truths, storing their hearts with the purest love, and sinking deep in their souls solid principles of righteousness, whose divine stones no waves of temptation can ever move.—A. E. Kittredge.

Children Should Love the Bible

Children love things that have given them pleasure and things which they have learned to use themselves. They hate things that they have been made to do or to use, and even truth will be numbered among the things they hate if it seems to be forced upon them. Many people today are strangers to the Bible because the Bible lessons of their youth were inserted instead of acquired. The Bible may easily be the central pivot of the family life, the force that inspires each day and the source from which parents draw the bed-time stories of which no child ever yet had enough. If thus used there is created a desire on the part of each child to be able to read these wonderful stories for himself.

Thus when first interested in the Bible, when fascinated by pictures that tell Bible stories or inculcate Bible truths, children will voluntarily pore over Bible verses, seeking those that fit the pictures, and almost unconsciously receive an appreciation of the divine guidance there expressed. The pictorial method of Bible study is that of our Second Bible Picture Study, in which every one may participate without expense.

Picture No. 31



Your Duty to Children

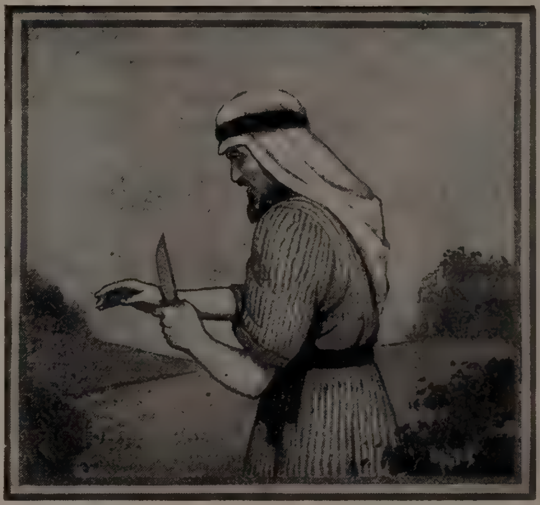
You may be a parent, or you may have children under your guardianship, or with a claim upon your love as relatives or friends. Think a moment: haven't you?

Why not give one of these children a Bible course that will be a pleasure, a series of pictures that tell wonderful stories of the Bible?

You know the fascination pictures have for children—big and little ones. You know how quickly and forcefully a picture can drive home a fact, a truth, where words might not be read.

You can send the Christian Herald for 20 weeks and the complete Outfit of the Second Bible Picture Study to anyone you wish who is not now a subscriber, by sending us $1.00.

Picture No. 32



The Second Bible Picture Study

Consists of a series of pictures, published in the Christian Herald, a list of 2,000 carefully chosen Bible verses, and an Answer Book. The participant selects, from the verses, those that best express what the pictures show, writes his or her selections in the Answer Book, and sends it in to us. Those submitting the best lists will be awarded 1,000 cash prizes, totaling $5,628.00. The first reward will be $1,000.00, the second $800.00, the third $600.00, the fourth $400.00, etc.

An Easter Gift of Lasting Value

What more appropriate time to make such a present to one of your youthful relatives? Think, too, what the child may gain in other ways—perhaps the very first award of $1,000 in cash! That can mean a university education, or a start in life that will bring joy. So while presenting a delightful home recreation and a solid course of real Bible study, you may be giving other unusual benefits. Act for some child entitled to your love!

write you was practicin' so hard— But massy! Them biscuits I started risin' won't be ready for supper if I don't stop here an' now, an' I want to get an extry good supper—sort of in celebration of your stayin' home a spell longer."

AS good Mother Hanscomb bustled out of the room, Roberta gave herself an indignant shake; she hadn't meant to indulge in "hymn-singing" even if she should find voice to do so after the prescribed six months' rest. And yet her very life had once depended on the fact that when she wanted to hear a silly little refrain, the song had not been withheld. "Good enough, good enough! I long to sing Hosanna!" Ah, yes, though it had tested the strength of the singer's very soul to voice the words, she had sung them—to her! And now should she (who agonized to sing more melodious hosannas than the mother had even dreamed of hearing) should she deny her the joy of hearing a simple air, if indeed the power to sing lay within her? Shaken with mingled penitence and dread and desire, she fled to her room, there to try whether or no any music still existed within the long-abused vocal chords.

They were of indifferent quality, the notes which she essayed safe in the privacy of her chamber. Though dismay held her in its grasp as she contemplated the prospect, she made a firm determination to sing one or two hymns each night to the two dear ones.

She seated herself carelessly at the little parlor organ when the tea things had been washed and dried, playing the old tune of "We'd better bide a wee." Father Hanscomb, hearing the unwonted sound, laid aside his paper and came in, followed closely by Mother Hanscomb. Roberta looked up.

"I won't sing this—to-night," she said bravely. "The first song shall be a hymn. Choose."

Together the choice was announced, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and Roberta sang it through in some sort of fashion, escaping immediately to clench her hands in impotent rage as she admitted the utter crudity of her attempt. "Nearer—e'en though it be a cross—" Surely no one ever had so heavy a cross as hers. Still, Father and Mother Hanscomb's tear-stained, joy-irradiated faces were a solace; to them she was still the marvelous soprano; and with a softer "lump" than usual in her throat, she went to bed.

SO the days went by, always with the same ending, the singing of a hymn, and day by day Roberta came to realize that less of the love-glamour was required in order to make the singing endurable. Indeed, she came to appraise herself with a modicum of justice, and to decide at last that the singing of the first hymn of the evening was not undeserving of the encore which for long had not been satisfied.

In these later days she had brought herself to attend the little church where her music-loving soul was harassed by the frantic efforts of the choir to sing arias far beyond the ability of singers untrained in expression and voice-control, however good their natural voices might be.

ON Easter morning, however, Roberta walked the floor in tortured dismay as she thought once more of the music which she had sung the previous year; and then with stern resolve fought down her impulse to stay at home far from the maddeningly shrill voices of the village choir. It was at this juncture that she was called to the telephone, whence issued an importunate request from the pastor that she give the Easter music of the day; the members of the choir, including the organist, had gone to the city the day before to attend a rehearsal at one of the churches. Late at night he had received a message that they had missed the last train home, and now could not return until Monday. In his dilemma he was turning to Roberta; of course he could not pay her, and her failure to sing in any of the services had led him to believe that she sang only for remuneration, yet—she was his one resource. Would she not do this in the name of Him who had laid down his life for others, freely?

In vain Roberta attempted to explain without explaining. Not unnaturally the minister failed to understand, and at length Roberta acquiesced, trembling as she did so at the mere thought of once more letting her voice be heard by strangers.

A very diffident girl presided at the organ, successfully—though somewhat to Roberta's surprise—marshaling the worshipers into church, where she was also able to keep an entire measure in advance of those who sang the doxology.

And then as with bowed head Roberta asked for divine strength for the ordeal before her in the rendition she was about to give—the simple little melody of The Magdalene—the conviction flashed upon her that she could sing once more the solo which in the months gone by had, she believed, been her "swan song."

"I know that my Redeemer liveth!"

Father and Mother Hanscomb in the pew below, pulsing with pride and joy, held their very breath as the sweet, wonderful strains flowed on.

"For now is Christ risen from the dead!"

THE clear, pure tones which had been wont to delight the music-lovers of a music-loving city were never more wonderful, and Roberta herself, appreciating the fact that she had at last received her "commission," and was discharging the same in a manner not unworthy even of the glorious theme and score before her, thrilled with a new-born longing to sing His praise who had given back to her the gift of song.

At the close of the service a gray-haired man, whose features were dimly familiar to Roberta, approached her with outstretched hands.

"I came to the village on two missions," he told her smilingly. "Invariably it is my custom to visit my aged mother on this day of days, that I may sing to her. I recalled the fact, too, that our soprano soloist of a year ago, who was obliged to leave us suddenly by reason of ill health, lived in this town. You recollect me now? the conductor of the Oratorio Society. I inferred that if you had quite recovered you would be the singer today in your own home church; and may I say, Miss Hanscomb, that I am more than pleased. Your voice was never better—I doubt if as good. And so I offer to you your old position. Will you come with us?"

And Roberta smiled her answer with eyes that somehow reminded the conductor of a sunrise veiled in mist.

America's Greatest "Light Six" $1595

"America's First Car"

America's Greatest "Light Twelve" $2095

"The High Cost of Motoring" is a Bugaboo!

From 87 different sections of the country—the "stamping grounds" of some 9,500 Haynes "Light Sixes"—reports have just reached us giving definite figures on what it is costing Haynes owners to run their cars today!

These are the averages:

14⅓ to 18 miles per gallon of gasoline—
(including the present low quality grades.) 12 miles per gallon is the lowest reported—22 miles the highest.

5,956 to 7,803 miles on TIRES.
(Far in excess of 8000 miles would have been the higher figure had we included unusually good records, such as 12,500, 15,000 and higher mileages.)

199 to 291 miles per QUART of oil.

$200, $300 and $400 higher prices being offered for used Haynes cars than for comparable cars. (Few Haynes owners are willing to sell despite these attractive offers.)

1 to 60 miles per hour on high gear—pickup from a stop to 30 miles per hour in 7½ brief seconds—ability to climb, and accelerate on long steep hills without dropping from high gear—with MORE PULLING POWER at moderate speed or through deep mud, sand and snow, than any other 3½-inch x 5-inch, 6 cylinder engine!

Such is the performance which 18,000 Haynes "Light Six" owners—for periods up to three years—have been enjoying at these amazingly LOW costs for upkeep.

And the same low upkeep—the same matchless performance is assured to you. For 1917 Haynes "Light Sixes," while embodying all recent mechanical improvements, are fundamentally alike Haynes "Light Sixes" of 1916, 1915 and 1914.

Though 1917 output is doubled, demand has tripled. Order your Haynes early!

The Lord's Day the Best Day

Christian Endeavor Topic. Neh. 13 : 15–22

Right and Wrong Use of Sunday

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Heb. 10 : 19–25

THE question of Sabbath-keeping is one which is much discussed, but never settled. The references chosen for the two topics represent the two extremes of Christian opinion regarding the Lord's day. Nehemiah restored to Jerusalem the observance of the Jewish Sabbath. The writer of Hebrews is urging a more complete use for spiritual blessing of the Christian Lord's Day. Many good Christians insist that all the Old Testament law of the Sabbath should govern the observance of the Christian Sunday. This is obviously impossible. In fact, the Lord himself, as an object-lesson to the law-worshiping Pharisees, deliberately transgressed the law of the Sabbath as it was then understood in order that he might declare the truth which had escaped the Jewish theologians, that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." Many people quote this verse as a warrant for uses of the day which are not in themselves Christian, and which replace worship, forgetting the further words of Christ in which he said, "For the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath."

It is impossible to be dogmatic as to the use of Sunday, or to draw up a list of things which you may do and which you may not do. But there is a very safe rule, which is, do nothing on Sunday which you cannot do in the name of the Lord Jesus, and keep the day as much as possible free for worship and for spiritual growth. This does not preclude the extension of friendship or the worshipful enjoyment of the beauties of nature, but it must include the assembling of ourselves together and the exhorting of one another, each provoking the other "unto love and good works."

How God Guides

Epworth League Topic. Ex. 18 : 17–22; Acts 16 : 10; James 1 : 5–7

NO traveler, in the days when travel for pleasure was possible abroad, would have thought of going to Europe without his Baedeker. No automobilist would start on a transcontinental trip without maps of the roads which he must travel. Yet many Christians try to travel an uncharted sea and to stumble to perfection along unknown paths, keeping themselves constantly lost in a spiritual wilderness. It is possible for us to know, and to know with assurance, God's plan for our lives. The Scriptures are full of evidence as to the willingness of God to guide those who are willing to follow his leadership. When Moses found himself overburdened with the cares of a nation, God sent Jethro, his father-in-law, to suggest the appointment of judges over tens and hundreds and thousands, who should judge the lesser matters and send up to Moses only those exceeding their powers. Thus Moses was relieved of the petty details of his administration and given freedom for spiritual leadership.

Paul was guided into Macedonia by a direct revelation of the will of God, imparted to him in a dream. James advised the early church, and his advice is good today, that "if any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." James took pains to stress the necessity of full faith in prayer, saying, "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." Thus there are three ways in which God will guide our lives according to his purposes: through our friends, through direct revelation, and through prayer. Sometimes we are impatient at the suggestions of our friends. We are so certain of our power and so sure that we have thought things out properly and have reached the only wise solution, that sometimes we fret when our friends fail to agree with us. Sometimes we are even unkind in our replies, yet in rebuffing our friends we may be refusing the guidance of heaven. Sometimes we feel impelled to do a certain thing in a certain way, with an impulse which we cannot explain. It may be that the impulse is God's way of leading us. Sometimes we are doubtful, and the way before us is dark, our life seems to have raveled out, we seem to be getting nowhere. Then, more than ever, our place is on our knees, and we may be certain that prayer for guidance will be answered by assurance as to the proper course for us to take. The promise, "Lo, I am with you alway," means more than mere companionship. It means help and comfort and guidance.

And how beautiful she was! How sweet! How dear! And how she had suffered in her loneliness! How he would love to make for her a future all gloriously happy and tender with his strong, encircling arms!

It was a pleasant picture. Burke Denby's heart quite swelled within him as he turned to leave the room.

Upstairs, the girl, the cause of it all, hurried with palpitating nervousness through the task of clothing two active little bodies in fresh garments. That her thoughts were not with her fingers was evident; but not until the summoning bell from the drawing-room gave her a few minutes' respite from duty did she have an opportunity really to think. Even then she could not think lucidly or connectedly. Always before her eyes was Burke Denby's face, ardent, pleading, confident. And he expected—Before she saw him again she must be ready, she knew, with her answer. But how could she answer?

Helen Barnet was lonely, heartsick, and frightened—a combination that could hardly aid in the making of a wise, unprejudiced decision, especially when one was very much in love. And Helen Barnet knew that she was that.

LESS than two years before, Helen Barnet had been the petted daughter of a village storekeeper in a small Vermont town. Then, like the proverbial thunderbolt, had come death and financial disaster, throwing her on her own resources. And not until she had attempted to utilize those resources for her support had she found how frail they were.

Though the Barnets had not been wealthy, the village store had been profitable; and Helen (the only child) had been almost as greatly overindulged as was Burke Denby himself. Being a very pretty girl, she had become the village belle before she donned long dresses. Having been shielded from work and responsibility, and always carefully guarded from everything unpleasant, she was poorly equipped for a struggle of any sort, even aside from the fact that there was, apparently, nothing that she could do well enough to be paid for doing it. In the past twenty months she had obtained six positions—and had abandoned five of them: two because of incompetency, two because of lack of necessary strength, one because her beauty was plainly making the situation intolerable. For three months now she had been nurse to Masters Paul and Percy Allen. She liked Mrs. Allen, and she liked the children. But the care, the confinement, the never-ending task of dancing attendance upon the whims and tempers of two active little boys, was proving to be not a little irksome to young blood unused to the restraints of self-sacrifice. Then, suddenly, there had come the visit to the Denby homestead, and the advent into her life of Burke Denby; and now here, quite within her reach, if she could believe her eyes and ears, was this dazzling, unbelievable thing—Burke Denby's love.

COMMANDERS OF THE AMERICAN ARMY DEPARTMENTS AS REORGANIZED MARCH 24

Our Nation in a State of War

THE Special Session of the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States convened in Washington at noon on April 2. As it met, the air of the Capitol was charged with the expectation of vital action. It was the general feeling that the President would ask from Congress a recognition of a state of war, if not an actual declaration, and no one questioned the likelihood that Congress would be swift to act upon the Executive request. But there was not by any means a unanimous sense of the necessity for war. Delegations of those still willing to serve the cause of peace poured into Washington during Saturday and Sunday and more than a thousand citizens thronged the steps of the Capitol and poured through its corridors in a last effort to stay the threat of armed conflict. Other citizens also thronged the Capitol, just as determined as were the pacifists, but determined against peace. In the halls of Congress, too, opinions divided, individual representatives and senators, notably Senators Stone and Gronna, declaring their unalterable opposition to war at this time for the causes so far apparent. Peace, though not friendless, did not, however, play the major part in the play of forces at the nation's Capitol. War, the war that Secretary Lansing said we stood on the brink of only a few weeks ago, was recognized as a fact and even as the President and Congress went through the constitutional program, by which it is provided that this democracy shall turn from the arts of peace to the science of war, the several departments of the government were pushing forward every element of preparation for hostile action.

The Senate met only to recess until three o'clock to give the House time to organize. The House proceeded at once to the election of a speaker, one ballot only being required to re-elect as speaker, Champ Clark of Missouri. The Democrats were able also to hold enough votes to organize the House. There was, however, a minimum of partisanship in the proceedings and in the speeches that were made and there was a very evident intention on the part of the majority in both parties to "stand behind the President." The temper of the House and perhaps of the nation as well may have been well illustrated in this opening prayer of the chaplain. "Diplomacy has failed. Moral suasion has failed. Appeals to reason and justice have been swept aside. We abhor war and love peace, but if war has been or shall be forced upon us, we pray that the heart of every American citizen may throb with patriotic feeling and that a united people may rally around our President to hold up his hand in every measure deemed necessary to protect the lives of American citizens and safeguard our inheritance."

So certain was Representative Flood, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, that the President would ask for a war declaration in some form, that he prepared a resolution for submission to the House after the President's communication should have been laid before the Congress. The resolution follows:

Whereas the recent acts of the Imperial German Government are acts of war against the government and people of the United States:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared, and

That the President be and he is hereby authorized to take immediate steps not only to put the country in thorough state of defense, but also to exert all of its power and employ all of its resources to carry on war against the Imperial German Government and to bring the conflict to a successful termination.

This resolution was introduced into the House immediately after the conclusion of the President's address. An identical resolution was also introduced in the Senate and was referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

President Wilson's Address at the Opening of Congress

At 8:30 P. M. on April 2, the President appeared before a joint session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and read the following message:

Gentlemen of the Congress:

I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately, which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should assume the responsibility of making.

On the 3rd of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the first day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April of last year the Imperial Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft, in conformity with its promise, then given to us, that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meager and haphazard enough, as was proved in distressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business, but a certain degree of restraint was observed.

German Submarine Policy Sweeps Aside All Restrictions

The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation has right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded.

This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside, under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these, which it is impossible to employ, as it is employing them, without throwing to the wind all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world.

I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination.

Challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

Armed Neutrality Now Appears Impracticable

When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws, when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavor to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all.

The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which we modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ship will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual; it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making; we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

Advises Declaration of State of War

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense, but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

What War Will Involve

What this will involve is clear. It will involve the utmost practicable co-operation in counsel and action with the Governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those Governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs.

It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the nation in the most abundant and yet the most economical and efficient way possible.

It will involve the immediate full equipment of the navy in all respects, but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines.

It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States, already provided for by law in case of war, of at least 500,000 men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training.

It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits of the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation, because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits, which will now be necessary, entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people, so far as we may, against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

In carrying out the measures by which these things are to be accomplished we should keep constantly in mind the wisdom of interfering as little as possible in our own preparation and in the equipment of our own military forces with the duty—for it will be a very practical duty—of supplying the nations already at war with Germany with the materials which they can obtain only from us or by our assistance. They are in the field and we should help them in every way to be effective there.

I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government, for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon whom the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the nation will most directly fall.

Our Object to Vindicate Principles of Peace

While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world, what our motives and our objects are. My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last two months, and I do not believe that the thought of the nation had been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the 22d of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the 3rd of February and on the 26th of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power, and to set up among the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles.

Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic Governments, backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their Governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized States.

America Has No Quarrel with German People

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days, when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools.

Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbor States with spies or set the course of intrigue to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs.

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic Government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would eat its vitals away; the plottings of inner circles who could plan what they would and render account to no one would be a corruption seated at its very heart. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honor steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

Russian Revolution Has Heartened the World

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude toward life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose; and now it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added, in all their native majesty and might, to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a League of Honor.

One of the things that has served to convince us that the Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend is that from the very outset of the present war it has filled our unsuspecting communities, and even our offices of government, with spies and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries and our commerce. Indeed, it is now evident that its spies were here even before the war began; and it is unhappily not a matter of conjecture, but a fact proved in our courts of justice, that the intrigues, which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country, have been carried on at the instigation, with the support, and even under the personal direction of official agents of the Imperial Government, accredited to the Government of the United States.

Even in checking these things and trying to extirpate them we have sought to put the most generous interpretation possible upon them because we knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people toward us, (who were, no doubt, as ignorant of them as we ourselves were,) but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing. But they have played their part in serving to convince us at last that that Government entertains no real friendship for us, and means to act against our peace and security at its convenience. That it means to stir up enemies against us at our very doors the intercepted note to the German Minister at Mexico City is eloquent evidence.

We Accept Battle with Natural Foe of Liberty

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a Government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, can be no assured security for the democratic Governments of the world. We are now about to accept the gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience.

The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Just because we fight without rancor and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.

I have said nothing of the Governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honor. The Austro-Hungarian Government has, indeed, avowed its unqualified indorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine warfare, adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski, the Ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary; but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United States on the seas, and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of postponing a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our right.

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not with enmity toward a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible Government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck.

We Are the Sincere Friends of the German People

We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early re-establishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us, however hard it may be for them for the time being to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present Government through all these bitter months because of that friendship, exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible.

We shall happily still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions toward the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live among us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it toward all who are in fact loyal to their neighbors and to the Government in the hour of test. They are most of them as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known any other fealty or allegiance. They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose. If there should be disloyalty, it will be dealt with with a firm hand of stern repression; but, if it lifts its head at all, it will lift it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few.

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great, peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance.

Right Is More Precious than Peace

But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own Governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured.

God helping her, she can do no other.

WAR PRISONERS HEAR THE GOSPEL GLADLY

A NUMBER of interesting letters have been received from various evangelical pastors associated in the operations of the Gospel Committee for Work among War Prisoners in the great German concentration camps. One of these devoted workers is Pastor Flad, of Paderborn, who writes that, with the shifting of a very large number of the prisoners from the big camps to the industrial districts, there was necessarily a change in pastoral work. The military authorities issued an order directing that the local pastors in the new districts should assume the spiritual care of the prisoners. This was a relatively easy arrangement to carry through where the prisoners were Roman Catholics; they were simply led to the Catholic church by their guards. It was, however, different in the case of the evangelical English among the captives, for the local pastors, with few exceptions, knew no English. However, a number of retired missionaries came forward and tendered their services to the Committee, and so the difficulty was overcome.

PASTOR FLAD, who spent fully six months in organizing this new phase of the work, gives an interesting description of its progress. He appeared before the assembled prisoners in the German church, in Anglican vestments and without even the slightest protest on the part of his colleagues. The service was made familiar to the prisoners, and the regular congregegation of the church was excluded while the prisoners worshiped. They were permitted occasionally to bring their own instruments, violins, cornets, etc., to accompany the singing.

Through Pastor Flad's thoughtful arrangement, and with the consent of the local pastors, a combination of the two services was made, and the prisoners themselves were invited to make a choice of some one of their number who should conduct that part of the prayer service which was to appeal especially to them. This offer was accepted with thanks and appreciation, and was evidently very satisfactory to the prisoners. "My colleagues," writes the pastor, "cordially warmed to the cause throughout these services, which had relegated prejudice and resentment against the English to the province of political feeling. We said to ourselves, 'This is a matter of caring for the needs and the healing of immortal souls.' Many of us were deeply affected by the singing of the English soldiers, by their devotional mood, and their hearty participation in the prayers and the responses." And in this way, and after the same pattern, regular services for the prisoners were instituted in many of the working units (or Kommandos). The local ministers were deeply interested in the work, and aided greatly in the choice of religious literature. They were successful in coming into friendly relations with the prisoners, in spite of the gulf of language and other differences.

"Those cases were, of course," Pastor Flad explains, "more satisfactory and gratifying where a visit led to my discovery and enlistment of a colleague, who was master of English, and who now held regular services for the English prisoners in the neighboring Kommandos. This was the case in the camp at Wittenberg, where Rev. Mr. Krdsmann, formerly German pastor in Liverpool, holds services regularly. To hold each service he has to travel by wagon from his home at Zenden, three hours distant. Another former German pastor of Liverpool, M. Rosenkranz, now serves regularly half a dozen Kommandos in the district. Two of these Kommandos informed me that I need not trouble myself about them, as they were attended to by a pastor who was master of English, and who had taken over the ministry of the neighboring Kommandos."

ANOTHER devoted pastor who is doing effective service in connection with the plans of the Gospel Committee for Work among War Prisoners is Superintendent Klingender of Paderborn, who has the religious care of a large number of prisoners. At the outbreak of the war he could not speak a word of English, but now he has so progressed that he can hold devotional services in that language. The first ministerial service he conducted was touching. In September, 1914, a young English officer lay seriously wounded in a hospital in Paderborn. A pressure of the hand and a prayer in German were all that could be offered at first. Then the superintendent made use of his splendid gift of song to bring comfort to the wounded man. He procured an English Hymn book through the kindness of the wife of Major Von Bodelschwing, and on his next visit to the hospital asked the invalid prisoner which was his favorite hymn. Then the superintendent went back to Mrs. Von Bodelschwing, and had her help him with the pronunciation. To the astonishment of the wounded man, the superintendent on his next visit sang to him the whole of the beautiful hymn: "The King of Love my Shepherd is, Whose Goodness Faileth Never." Greatly moved, and sincerely thankful, the Englishman pressed his hand—it was his confirmation hymn. That many English prisoners in the early days of the war received a deep impression through this kindly superintendent has been shown again and again by the inquiries of prisoners in the working sections and the hearty greetings they have sent to him through other pastors.

But the most gracious thing about him is that he has thrown his own church open to the prisoners—the time-honored Abdinghof Church. Since the spring of 1916 there has been a regular fortnightly service held there for the English on Sundays at 5 o'clock. The people of three Kommandos are led to this. A German soldier in gray uniform plays the organ. The English prisoners who worship there appear always very clean and well dressed. A few Belgian and French prisoners sometimes come with them, for whom also a few words are read in their own tongue, and for whom the Lord's Prayer, the Creed and a prayer in French are introduced into the English service. The pleasure of a trip to town, and the joy of being able to sing their own hymns and repeat their prayers in a beautiful church, and to hear an English sermon read by the superintendent, makes these people come gladly. They are, of course, full of gratitude for what the superintendent offers them so regularly.

WRITING of his own services Pastor Flad says: "Once a month I hold the Sunday service for our men in gray, in the large room and the adjoining

Germany Knows No Cause for War With America

"GERMANY never had the slightest intention of attacking the United States of America, and does not have such intention now. It never desired war against the United States of America and does not desire it today," declared the German Imperial Chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, in a speech in the Reichstag on March 29. Concerning relations with the United States, the chancellor continued: "Within the next few days the directors of the American nation will be convened by President Wilson for an extraordinary session of Congress in order to decide the question of war or peace between the American and German nations. How did these things develop? More than once we told the United States that we made restricted use of the submarine weapon, expecting that England could be made to observe, in her policy of blockade, the laws of humanity and international agreements. This blockade policy—this I expressly recall—has been called 'illegal and indefensible' by President Wilson and Secretary of State Lansing. Our expectations, which we maintained during eight months, have been disappointed completely. England not only did not give up her illegal and indefensible policy of blockade, but uninterruptedly intensified it. England, together with her allies, arrogantly rejected the peace offers made by us and our allies, and proclaimed her war objects, which aim at our annihilation and that of our allies. Then we took unrestricted submarine warfare into our hands; then we had to for our defense. If the American nation considers this a cause for which to declare war against the German nation, with which it has lived in peace for more than one hundred years, if this action warrants an increase of bloodshed, we shall not have to bear the responsibility for it. The German nation, which feels neither hatred nor hostility against the United States of America, will also bear and overcome this."

St. Louis, Armed, Evades Submarines. The American liner St. Louis, armed for defense against submarines, reached an English port on March 27 with thirty-one passengers and a complete cargo of non-contraband goods. As she entered the submarine zone, the St. Louis was met by English patrol boats. No submarines were sighted. She was followed into port by the American liner Manchuria, also armed but carrying no passengers.

Will not Interne Germans. Secretary of War Baker on March 26 authorized the statement that "everybody of every nationality who conducts himself in accordance with American law will be free from official molestation, both now and in the future." It is said to be the opinion of the department that serious uprisings can be guarded against without resorting to detention camps, which would be highly expensive and would also work a great hardship to many innocent people.

Swedish Cabinet Resigns. King Gustav of Sweden on March 28 accepted the resignation of the entire cabinet. The resignations had been handed to him on March 5 following the defeat of the government in parliament, which appropriated only one-third of the sum requested for the preservation of Swedish neutrality.

British Women to Vote. Various events have forced the British Parliament to consider seriously the question of electoral reform. There is a well defined movement toward complete democratic franchise, with which it is expected will go both Irish home rule and woman suffrage. Former Premier Asquith proposed in the British Commons on March 28 a program for electoral reform which included woman suffrage. Six months' residence or the occupation of business premises were to be the only qualifications for voting, men and women to be admitted to the suffrage on equal terms. Premier Lloyd George on the same day paid a warm tribute to the work of women in connection with the war, stating that the present possibility of victory existed only because of the work of the women, that the whole industrial fabric would have to be recast after the war, and that "to give women no voice therein would be an outrage. It would be inequitable, unjust and ungrateful." There is every evidence that the election for Parliament which will follow the war will find the women in full possession of the ballot. Home rule in Ireland may come before the end of the war.

Reserve Bank Aids Nation. The Federal Reserve Bank on March 28 cashed $50,000,000 in treasury certificates in order to enable the treasury to pay for the Danish West Indies and to maintain a working level of funds in the treasury. The Federal Reserve Board also authorized advances by national banks and reserve banks against warrants for supplies for the different departments of the government, issued in excess of appropriations, pending the passage by Congress of supply bills which failed at the last session.

Would Raise Freight Rates. An informal conference between the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission and representatives of Eastern railroads was held in Washington on March 28 to discuss proposed advances in freight-rates. The Eastern roads were reported to be seeking an advance of 15 per cent. on all commodities except ore, coal and coke. Western lines were expected to ask for a similar increase, while Southern lines were said to have submitted figures showing that increases needed to meet additional costs of operation ranged between 18 and 22 per cent. The commission on March 30 refused to suspend tariffs proposed for rail and lake lines, thus granting these lines a 5 per cent. increase.

Governor of The Virgin Islands. Rear Admiral James H. Oliver, U. S. N., was named on

A submarine chaser built for the British. Uncle Sam will probably build 500 of them. They make thirty knots an hour and carry rapid fire-guns

March 28 to be temporary governor of the Virgin Islands, formerly the Danish West Indies, which were officially taken over by the United States government on Saturday, March 31. Admiral Oliver will govern the islands under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy until Congress provides a permanent form of government, and the islands will be known as the Virgin Islands, pending a decision as to their final designation.

Held in News Quarantine. By agreement between themselves and the German government, the Americans who had been directing the Belgian relief work in Belgium and the German-occupied portions of France were permitted to live for three weeks as guests of the German government in some German city which they selected in order that there might be no possibility of their being able to give any valuable military information to the enemy. The first announcement indicated that American Ambassador Whitlock would also be subjected to the same restraint, but this was later proved incorrect. Mr. Whitlock and his suite were expected on March 30 to proceed at once to Havre, via Switzerland.

Martial Law in Spain. Because of a threatened general strike, the Spanish cabinet on March 29 issued a proclamation suspending the constitutional guarantees. The general strike was said to have a revolutionary and patriotic character. The ringleaders were being arrested and their meeting places closed.

Fragments of News. It was officially announced in Mexico City on March 25 that Mexico was preparing to meet, in the near future, the interest on such of the foreign debt as it considered legitimate. Interest payments were suspended three years ago during the Huerta régime. . . . The officers and men of the interned German cruisers Kronprinz Wilhelm and Prinz Eitel Friedrich were interned at Forts McPherson and Oglethorpe, near Atlanta, Ga., on March 27. The German sailors reached the camp just as retreat was sounded and, by command of the officers, stood at attention while the band played the Star Spangled Banner and the flag was lowered. The officers, however, declared that neither they nor their men would give any pledges. . . . Dr. Alexis Carrel, who has helped develop in French war hospitals the most successful methods of treating wounds, is expected to return to America to conduct a course of instruction for American army surgeons and Red Cross nurses in the Carrel-Dakin method of treating wounds. . . . More than 6,000 victims of last summer's infantile paralysis epidemic in New York City were still under treatment on March 24. It is expected that the after-care will result in the final complete restoration of most of the children. . . . The Western Union Telegraph Company on March 27 issued an order, effective May 1, making the eight-hour day the basis for pay for over 25,000 employees who are now working nine hours a day. They will receive the same pay for eight hours which they now receive for nine, or will receive one-eighth more working the same time. . . . The former German Minister to China, Admiral von Hintze, and twenty-seven members of the German legation sailed from Shanghai on March 28 for San Francisco. . . . The United States Supreme Court on March 26 upheld the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, denying the application of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company to retain its line of steamers on the Great Lakes. . . . Senator A. A. Jones of New Mexico, who by inadvertence was referred to in the Christian Herald of March 21 as a Republican, is in reality a member of the Democratic party. . . . The National City Bank of New York estimates that the commerce of the world for the year 1916 reached a total of $45,000,000,000, $5,000,000 in excess of the former high record made in 1913. The United States led the world, her commerce exceeding that of Great Britain, the next highest, by a little over $700,000,000. . . . Cuban government troops on March 29 fought a decisive engagement with rebels in the neighborhood of Santiago, driving the rebels from their positions. It was expected that one more engagement would take place, but the rebels surrendered. . . . Officers of the Bell Telephone Company of New York admitted on March 30 that in the event of war there would probably be no new telephone construction and very little extension of present facilities, as the needs of the government would absorb all of the material available. . . . A force of Villistas, said to have been under the personal command of Villa, on March 30, was defeated by Mexican federal troops in an attack upon Chihuahua City. Carranzistas have claimed to have captured 500 of Villa's men, and estimated his other casualties at 350. . . . It was announced on March 31 that the American corporations which had received contracts for munitions from the Allies had in nearly every case completed the contracts and that no new contracts were forthcoming. Shipments of explosives and firearms from ports in the United States from August 1, 1914, to January 31, 1917, are said to have amounted in value to $1,059,828,156. . . . Congress convened in special session at noon on April 2nd.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON the western front the fighting during the past week, extending from a point a little to the east of Arras to a point just north of the Aisne River and almost directly north of the town of Soissons, indicates rather clearly that the German retreat to the eastward, which has been going on for the past three weeks, has ceased, and that the main body of the Teutonic army has reached its definite position. The present German line departs from the main battle-line at a village called Beauvains. Then it winds with more or less curves, occasioned by the topography of the country, to another village named Savy, directly to the west of St. Quentin. This, the northern portion of the line, is the British sector. Owing to the comparative slowness of the advance, they have not as yet reached the German base line along the whole length of their portion of the front, and continual fighting of a rather minor character has taken place between their advance guards and the German rear-guards. This fighting has, however, been of rather a sanguinary nature.

From Savy south, the line makes a curve to the eastward, reaching its apex about half-way between St. Quentin and La Fere, and then curves back again to the west around the town of La Fere towards Chauny, where it again changes direction and runs southeastwardly to the River Aisne, which it reaches at a point about half way between Baine and Soissons. On this portion of the line, all the earlier part of the week, March 24 to March 31, there has been really hard fighting. The French, who have held this part of the front, have made gallant and sustained efforts to drive a wedge through the German lines between St. Quentin and La Fere, and also to attack the La Fere position from the southwest. Both of these efforts, in which the French are in contact with the main German armies, have made some progress, but neither has yet advanced to the point necessary to force an evacuation of La Fere. Were such evacuation forced, it would result in the entire German line from Lille in the west to Rheims in the east being compelled to fall back a considerable distance, at least thirty miles, and would mechanically force the Germans to leave Lille, Cambrai and St. Quentin. It looks as though these present French efforts with their infantry will have to be supported by the use of their heavy artillery before anything more can be accomplished, and as this artillery has not yet been moved up from the old line to the one they at present occupy, and probably cannot be until several weeks have elapsed, presumably the fighting here will grow less, as it has begun to do in the past few days.

There has also been some activity on the Champagne sector of this western front in the region of Tahure. There the Germans in the early part of the week made a thrust at the French positions and captured a trench or two, together with some 300 prisoners. The French later recaptured these trenches, taking a small number of prisoners.

Aerial activities increased during the week, but it is impossible to state with which side the advantage there finally rested.

On March 27, speaking in the House of Lords on the submarine menace, Lord Beresford made the statement that the number of vessels sunk by the German submarines in February was 281, with an aggregate tonnage of over 500,000, and in March, up to presumably the 26th, 255 vessels, whose tonnage exceeded 420,000. Lord Beresford also said that, with the longer days and the calmer weather, losses from submarine activity would increase, and expressed the opinion that the number of submarines disposed of by the British was not equivalent to the new ones the Germans were launching. To these figures given by Lord Beresford the ships destroyed by mines are apparently to be added. Last year Britain built new ships of an aggregate tonnage of 619,336, and Holland of 298,180, out of a total built in European yards of 1,303,790.

The British troopship Tyndareus, on the way to Hongkong on February 9, struck a mine off Cape Agulhas, the extreme southern point of Africa. The vessel was saved, and there were no casualties among the troops on board. The question of how a mine got to the extreme southern point of Africa is a very interesting one. The most obvious solution is that the German raider Moewe had been in this vicinity.

The Germans say that no military operations of importance from the Baltic to the Carpathians will be possible for some time, as the spring thaw has set in. This will dispose of any offensive against Petrograd or Minsk for the present, at least.

The Austro-Italian front has apparently become calm again. The Italians, however, continue to assert that an Austro-German offensive is shortly to open on that front and that it is Hindenburg's intention to attempt to break through northern Italy into southern France. This would be a body blow for both the French and Italians, if it could be done, as Genoa and Marseilles might both be taken, with very important results; but, like many other military operations which look attractive on the surface, when closely examined it hardly seems practicable.

The British have lost a couple of destroyers in the Channel during the week.

Nothing very much can be said of the interior situation in Russia, though on the surface it appears reasonably calm. On the Palestine front, just north of the Syrian-Egyptian boundary, the British have won a victory of some importance, and besides forcing a Turkish army of 20,000 to retreat after suffering heavy losses, have captured some 900 prisoners, including the Turkish commander and his staff. The battle lasted a couple of days, and the exact scene was near the river Wadi Ghuzzeh, which is five miles north of the town of Gaza and near the coast. The British appear to be about fifty miles southwest of Jerusalem, on this front. The country between is, however, rather difficult, and will not be easy to negotiate. The Turks have probably fallen back to the town of Gaza, and more fighting may be expected before that place is taken.

Various reports from German sources and from neutral sources in countries adjoining Germany indicate that the movement for the liberalizing of the German political system is constantly gaining momentum. The more liberal of the German press is outspoken in support of the movement for democratic institutions, and although the conservative elements are fighting hard to avoid any constitutional change pending the end of the war, the evidence at hand at the end of March indicated that the public pressure for immediate action could not much longer be resisted. In the debates in the Reichstag the Chancellor's exclamation of March 14, "Woe to the statesman who does not recognize the signs of the times," has been constantly reaffirmed. The Munich Post declares that with revolution in Russia "Germany now stands against an alliance of world democracy, and the people of the world are persuaded and are daily becoming more convinced that the triumph of freedom in the world is impossible so long as Germany remains what she is."

Lord Robert Cecil, British Blockade Minister, issued a formal statement on March 30 in answer to statements of Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg in the Reichstag. In refutation of the Chancellor's claim that Germany renounced unrestricted use of the submarine in expectation that Great Britain would be made to observe in her blockade the laws of humanity and international agreements, Lord Cecil called attention to the statement made by the Chancellor in the institution of the unrestricted submarine warfare to be effect that as soon as "he himself, in agreement with the supreme army command, reached the conviction that ruthless U-boat warfare would bring Germany nearer to victorious peace, then the U-boat warfare would be started. This moment has now arrived. Last autumn the time was not ripe, but today the moment has come when with the greatest prospect of success we can undertake this enterprise."

Another German raider is reported in the South Atlantic, a French bark having arrived at Rio de Janeiro on January 30 with 200 men from various ships. The sailors stated that the raider was an armed sailing ship with a gasoline motor.

A Missing Hand

SUNDAY, April 15. Isa. 6 : 8. "Who will go for me?" Here is the Almighty waiting for a human instrument. The mere statement of such a possibility touches the soul with awe. The Father of our spirits has imposed upon himself a limitation which makes him dependent upon his children. There is divine work which tarries until the appointed soul arrives. We are exalted to be fellow laborers with God. What sublime dignity is hidden in the fellowship! What a coronal glory it confers upon the common life! The seemingly tiny inlet is related to the immeasurable seas. God's holy purposes lay hold of human ministries, and the insignificant inch is glorified by the Infinite.

And so it is that we men and women are to be standing at attention, waiting to receive our commissions. We are to have our loins girt and our lamps burning. We are to be "shod with the readiness of the Gospel of peace." For we never know when some purpose of the Lord is ripening, when a human instrument will be wanted and a new commission given. "At such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." And, therefore, it is our wisdom to be always ready, listening for the ennobling summons of the Lord. "How soon can you be ready for the Soudan?" Gordon was asked. "I am ready now," he answered. "As much as in me is," said the apostle Paul, "I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are in Rome also."

And what are our commissions likely to be? For the vast majority of us they are likely to be quite ordinary errands. The essential things in human life are spiritual vitalities, and these are carried in the simplest ministries. Apparently commonplace fidelities are laden with heaven's grace. The crying needs of the world are elemental, and they are to be met by the elemental satisfaction of faith, and hope, and love. To be the minister of these graces is to be the fellow laborer of God. I remember an incident in "Aurora Leigh." Lucy Gresham, the poor seamstress, lay dying in an attic. Marian Erle, also a poor seamstress, was in the workroom with the other girls when she heard the news. Laying down her work at once she hastened away to the sufferer that she might be God's minister in the hour of need. "Why, God," thought Marian, "has a missing hand this moment; Lucy wants a drink, perhaps. Let others miss me! Never miss me, God!" That willingness to be the missing hand is the secret and the genius of a consecrated life.

Daytime Mercies and Nighttime Songs

MONDAY, April 16. Ps. 42 : 8. "Yet the Lord will command his loving-kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life." Daytime mercies and nighttime songs—these cover all the scope of life: health and sickness, youth and age, success and failure, wealth and poverty, birth and death. God is in it all. We are never left alone. We can not prosper without his help, and we do not suffer without his pity. His loving-kindness makes possible the day, and his comfort in the nighttime makes the darkness radiant with hope.

There never was a life in which were not some dark nights. It saves us from despair to know that there may be "songs in the night." Paul and Silas sang at midnight in the prison at Philippi. Jesus and his disciples, after the institution of the Memorial Supper, sang a song. This is the only mention we have of our Lord's singing, and it was at night, when the shadows of the blackest night the world ever saw were falling on him.

Perhaps the darkest night any of us ever pass through is when we become conscious of failing health, when life's glories fade into a candle's ray. Yet there may be song even in this nighttime, such a song as that of Paul, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

"My prayer unto the God of my life." Atheism excludes God from life. Pantheism confuses God with all life, depersonalizes him. Christianity makes God the God of each life. What else can mean so much to us as this? To think that our lives, frail as they are, belong to God! From him, for him, to him! If he be the God of our lives, then life is something more than "a barren peak between the shoreless seas of two eternities." It is something in which he is interested and imminent. Our prayers are not mockeries, our hopes are not phantoms of the brain, our struggle for immortality is not merely the empty protest of a material nature against its own destruction. The living God is our God, and in his sight there are no dead. He is the Changeless One, and amidst the ceaseless flux of things he hears the cry of his feeblest child, "O thou who changest not, abide with me."

The High Degree of Love

TUESDAY, April 17. I Peter 4 : 8. "Above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins." What the apostle binds upon the hearts of Christians in this text as the most important element in practical Christianity is the degree of the love which they must practice in their relation to their fellow men, in particular to their brethren. The emphasis in this text is on "fervent." Love, especially forgiving love, is a plain and common duty of Christians. It is the badge of Christian discipleship. Without it no one can be accepted as a Christian. But forgiving love is put to severe tests in a world where sinning is the rule, not the exception, every day.

The apostle who writes these words had on one occasion attempted to apply arithmetic to the exercise of love. His love had been strong enough to induce him to forgive the seventh offense of a brother. He considered that quite a good specimen of intense or fervent Christian love. The Lord's answer raised the required intensity to the seventieth power, and that was done only to make Peter understand that he must not number his pardons he issued, like the governor of a state, so that at the four hundred and ninety-first offense he would feel justified to say: "Brother, you have exhausted your privilege with me."

The Christian must never wink at wrongdoing, and must not give the impression that he is indifferent to the sins of his brethren. He must plainly and fearlessly declare things wrong that are wrong. But he must in every instance pity the wrongdoer and shield him in every possible and honest way from the public effects of his wrongdoing. It is such love that has conquered many a stubborn heart; it has "gained the brother," while the lack of intense love has made reprobates of such as had sinned from weakness, as all Christians do.

The Agencies of Nature

WEDNESDAY, April 18. John 9 : 7. "Go wash in the pool of Siloam." The opening of the eyes of the blind man was the last instance of Christ's miraculous healing of disease. It may be that this was the reason why Jesus turned the blind man away from the miracle-worker to the use of the means of nature. We should make every effort to heal ourselves, and then trust in him as though you could do nothing without him. Go to hospitals of healing, homes of care and comfort. Though Jesus is going away, he will be in nature's remedies and the physician's skill to heal and help. We must not fail to use Christ's forces in nature as well as in grace, for he is the Creator, and all things are sacred which he holds in his hand, the material as well as the spiritual.

Christ means every follower when he says, "Go ye into all the world for me; I ascend to my Father; go in my stead; be my ambassadors." Help save souls, heal bodies, care for the needy, comfort the sorrowing. Use all my powers to help every one everywhere. We are to behold Christ, looking through and utilizing all the agencies he has created in nature, in the Bible and in the illuminated hearts of his children. Nothing is small nor insignificant which he has given to mankind.

Finding More Than We Seek

THURSDAY, April 19. Matt. 7 : 7. "Seek, and ye shall find." Columbus, seeking a western passage to India, found a new hemisphere. Marshall, digging a mill-race, found gold on the Pacific coast. Alexander Graham Bell, trying to help the hard of hearing, stumbled upon the telephone. The patient and persistent seeker not only finds, but often finds much more than he seeks. We, praying for smooth seas, or prosperous journeys, or recovery from illness, find God. What if the sea be rough, or the journey hard? What if recovery be delayed or denied? If we find God, if we find a nearness to him, a trust in him, a comfort in his presence we had not known before, our prayer is justified.

Fellowship with God is our greatest need, and prayer is a means to that fellowship. Our minor needs are motives to prayer. If hunger and thirst and heat and cold and poverty and sickness and fires and floods and war impel us to prayer, these are the rude couriers showing us the way to the audience chamber of the King. They are our servants who open doors for us and bid us bow low when we come into the presence of the Creator of the rolling spheres and Potentate of time. God is the soul's eternal home. We who feel the weight of the world's weariness, who know the bitterness of its worst and the vanity of its best, by prayer find our way home.

IF I HAD KNOWN

By Marion Bernice Craig

IF I had seen that home from which he came,
  Bare, cheerless, drear, and darkly desolate,
I should have had more charity—oh, shame
  That I should turn him friendless from my gate!

If I had known his yearnings for the good,
  And how he fought his losing fight alone,
If all his doubtings I had understood,
  I should have stayed his steps—if I had known.

I did not know; and when the tempter came,
  Speaking with evil questions in his heart,
He faltered—fell. I was the one to blame—
  I, who had failed to act a brother's part.

God Is With the Church

FRIDAY, April 20. Isa. 40 : 9. "O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain; O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!" Public disaster was about to overwhelm the commonwealth of Israel. The fearful catastrophe of the exile was beginning to cast its shadow before. Discerning men were reading the signs of the time, and interpreted them correctly as the doom of the political glory of God's elect race. What, then, would become of the promises made to this people, that out of them should come the Deliverer of the whole world? To arrest the despondency of Zion-Jerusalem, that is, of the church of the first dispensation, the prophet is sent to assert to its members in a most vigorous manner that God is with them, even though their national fortunes are waning.

God had never attached his gracious promises to their secular greatness. Even in their degradation and bondage he will remain their God, and the day shall come when all nations shall look with wonder at the despised race of the Jews, for out of Judah must come our Lord.

God's purposes concerning his church are ripening silently even when the external aspect of the church seems to be that of a decadent organization. When the affairs of the church seem to be in a disheartening condition, it is necessary that some one arise bold enough to assert the unconquerable power of that faith which rests on the word of God. Trumpet-tongued speakers should rise in the most prominent places and hurl a holy defiance at the forces that seek the ruin of the church, and tell them that they will never succeed. The church of God may suffer temporal losses and suffer a curtailment of its secular prestige, but it cannot be destroyed.

A Brother's Love

SATURDAY, April 21. Gen. 44 : 2. "Put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack's mouth of the youngest." Benjamin trembled when the silver cup was found in his sack. He did not know that it was a loving-cup from his lost brother Joseph; that it was placed there so as to bring the favorite brother to Joseph's arms again, as well as to reveal Joseph's forgiveness to all his brethren. Joseph must have said to himself, "If I let Benjamin go now, I shall never see him again to tell him of my great love."

The most beautiful brotherly scene in the Bible is when Joseph, with eyes flooded with tears and heart bursting with emotion, revealed himself to his terrified brothers by kissing all the older ones and throwing his arms around the neck of Benjamin, pouring out upon him the wealth of his heart's love.

Jesus, our Elder Brother, seeks to bring us back to himself by sending the Holy Spirit's convicting power into our hearts. How fearful and trembling we are when we return to the Saviour we have abused! Like culprits we stand before him awaiting our sentence, when, lo! he reveals himself, the compassionate Saviour, who loved us and gave himself for us, "the Friend who sticketh closer than a brother." Have we not betrayed him and sold him as the brothers sold Joseph? Does he not, like Joseph, receive us with open arms and feed us at his own table? Are not his storehouses full of the bread of life for all who will come unto him, without money and without price? Christ puts the silver cup of salvation to our lips, brimming full with the elixir of life, and tells us to go and bring the father, the mother, and all the family into his mansions of splendor, where there is room enough and to spare.

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER Author of "Pollyanna"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING INSTALMENT

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he found there Mrs. Eunice Allen, his father's younger sister, on a visit, with her two little boys. The boys were in charge of their nurse, Helen Barnet, who less than two years before had been the petted daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. When death and financial disaster had come, she found how frail were the resources she tried to utilize for her support. In the last 20 months she had lost five positions. For three months she had been nurse to Mrs. Allen's children. Burke Denby took the boys for a drive almost every day, accompanied, of course, by their nurse. For a week he continued his drives with Masters Paul and Percy Allen; then four little words of Helen Barnet changed for him the earth and the sky above. "When I go away—" she began. With a quick glance at the children playing on the rug before the fireplace, he crossed straight to the plainly surprised young woman and dropped himself in a chair at her side.—Now here, quite within her reach, if she could believe her eyes and ears, was this dazzling, unbelievable thing—Burke Denby's love.

Frosted Cakes and Shotguns

HELEN BARNET knew all about love. Had she not lisped its praises in odes to the moon in her high-school days? It had to do with flowers and music and angels. On the old porch back home—what was it that long-haired boy used to read to her? Oh, Tennyson. That was it.

And now it had come to her—love. Not that it was exactly unexpected: she had been waiting for her lover since she had put up her hair, of course. But to have him come like this—and such a lover! So rich—and he was such a grand, handsome young man, too! And she loved him. She loved him dearly. If only she dared say "yes"! No more poverty, no more loneliness, no more slaving at the beck and call of some hated employer. Oh, if she only dared!

For one delirious moment Helen Barnet almost thought she did—dare. Then, bitterly, the thought of his position—and hers—rolled in upon her. Whatever else the last two wretched years had done for her, it had left her no illusions. She had no doubts as to her reception, as Burke Denby's wife, at the hands of Burke Denby's friends and relatives. And again, whatever the last two years had done for her, they had not robbed her of her pride. And the Barnets, away back in the little Vermont town, had been very proud. To Helen Barnet now, therefore, the picture of herself as Burke Denby's wife, flouted and frowned upon by Burke Denby's friends, was intolerable. Frightened and heartsick, she determined to beat a hasty retreat. It simply could not be. That was all. Very likely, anyway, Burke Denby had not been more than half in earnest himself.

The bell rang then again from the drawing-room, and Helen went down to get the children. In the hall she met Burke Denby; but she only shook her head in answer to his low "Helen, when may I see you?" and hurried by without a word, her face averted.

THREE times again within the next twenty-four hours she pursued the same tactics, only to be brought up sharply at last against a peremptory "Helen, you shall let me talk to you a minute! Why do you persist in hiding behind those two rascally infants all the time, when you know that you have only to say the word, and you are as free as the air?"

"But I must—that is—I can't say the word, Mr. Denby. Truly I can't!"

His face fell a little.

"What do you mean? You can't mean—you can't mean—you won't—marry me?"

She threw a hurried look about her. He had drawn her into the curtained bay window of the upper hallway, as she was passing on to the nursery.

"Yes, I mean—that," she panted, trying to release her arm from his clasp.

"Helen! Do you mean you don't care!" he demanded passionately.

"Yes, yes—that's what I mean." She pulled again at her arm.

"Helen, look at me. You can't look me straight in the eye and say you don't care!"

"Oh, yes, I can. I—I—" The telltale color flooded her face. With a choking little breath she turned her head quite away.

"You do—you do! And you shall marry me!" breathed the youth, his lips almost brushing the soft hair against her ear.

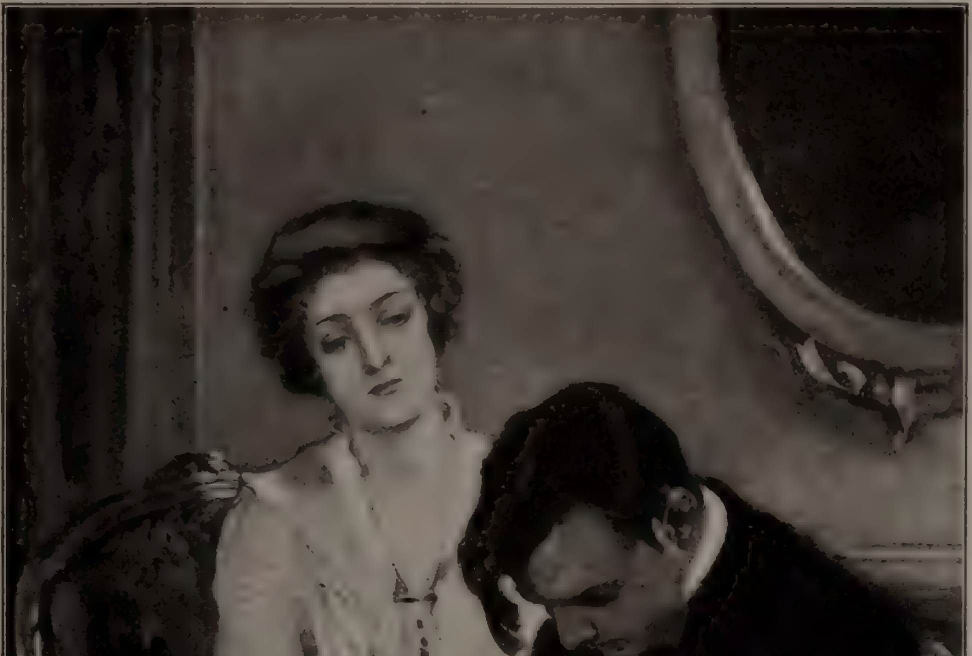
"No, no, Mr. Denby, I can't—I—can't!" With a supreme effort she wrenched herself free and fled down the hall.

If Helen Barnet thought this settled the matter, she ill judged the nature of the man with whom she had to deal. Unlimited frosted cakes and shotguns had not taught Burke Denby to accept no for an answer—especially for an answer to something he had so set his heart upon as he had this winning of Helen Barnet for his wife.

Burke Denby did not know anything about love. He had never sung odes to the moon, or read Tennyson to pretty girls on secluded verandas. He had not been looking for love to meet him around the bend of the next street. Love had come now as an Event, capitalized. Love was Life, and Life was Heaven—if it might be passed with Helen Barnet at his side. Without her it would be— But Burke ignored the alternative. It was not worth considering, anyway, for of course she would be at his side.

She loved him; he was sure of that. This fancied obstacle in the way that loomed so large in her eyes, he did not fear in the least. He really rather liked it. It added zest and excitement, and would make his final triumph all the more heart-warming and satisfying. He had only to convince Helen, of course, and the mere convincing would not be without its joy and compensation.

It was with really pleasurable excitement, therefore, that Burke Denby laid his plans and carried them to the triumphant finish of a carefully arranged tête-à-tête in the library, when he knew that they would have at least half an hour to themselves.



"Burke, listen! You're going to make good. We'll show them"

"There, I've got you now, you little wild thing!" he cried, closing the library door, and standing determinedly with his back to it, as she made a frightened move to go, at finding herself alone with him.

"But, Mr. Denby, I can't. I really must go," she palpitated.

"No, you can't go. I've had altogether too much trouble getting you here, and getting those blessed youngsters safely away with their mamma for a bit of a drive with my dad."

"Then you planned this?"

"I did." He was regarding her with half-quizzical, wholly fond eyes. "And I had you summoned to the library—but I was careful not to say who wanted you. Oh, Helen, Helen, how can you seek to avoid me like this, when you know how I love you!" There was only tenderness now in his voice and manner. He had taken both her hands in his.

"But you mustn't love me."

"Not love—my wife?"

"I'm not your wife."

"You're going to be, dear."

"I can't. I told you I couldn't, Mr. Denby."

"My name is 'Burke,' my love."

His voice was whimsically light again. Very plainly Mr. Burke Denby was not appreciating the seriousness of the occasion.

She flushed and bit her lip.

"I think it's real mean of you to—to make it so hard for me!" she half sobbed.

With sudden passion he caught her in his arms.

"Hard? Hard? Then if it's hard, it means you do love me. As if I'd give you up now! Helen, why do you torture me like this? Dearest, when will you marry me?"

She struggled feebly in his arms.

"I told you; never."

"Why not?"

No answer.

"Helen, why not?" He loosened his clasp and held her off at arms' length.

"Because."

"Because what?"

No answer again.

"You aren't—promised to any one else?" For the first time a shadow of uneasy doubt crossed his face.

She shook her head.

"Oh, no."

"Then what is it?"

Her eyes, frightened and pleading, searched his face. There was a tense moment of indecision. Then in a tragic burst it came.

"Maybe you think I'd—marry you, and be your wife, and have all your folks look down on me!"

"Look down on you?"

"Yes, because I'm not so swell and grand as they are. I'm only—"

With a quick cry he caught her to himself again, and laid a reproving finger on her lips.

"Hush! Don't you let me hear you say that again—those horrid words! You are you, yourself, the dearest, sweetest little woman that was ever made, and I love you, and I'm going to marry you. Look down on you, indeed! I'd like to see them try it!"

"But they will. I'm only a nurse-girl."

"Hush!" He almost shook her in his wrath. "I tell you, you are you—and that's all I want to know. And that's all anybody will want to know. I'm not in love with your ancestors, or with your relatives, or your friends. I don't love you because you are, or are not, a nurse-girl, or a school-teacher, or a butterfly of fashion. I even don't love you because your eyes are blue, or because your wonderful hair is like the softest of spun gold. It's just because you are you, sweetheart; and you, just you, are the whole wide world to me!"

"But—your father?"

"He will love you because I love you. Dad is my good chum—he's always been that. What I love, he'll love. You'll see."

"Do you think he really will?" A dawning hope was coming into her eyes.

"I'm sure he will. Why, dad is the other half of myself. Always, all the way up, dad has been like that. And everything I've wanted, he's always let me have."

She drew a tremulous breath of surrender.

"Well, of course, if I thought you all wanted me—"

"Want you!" With his impulsive lips on hers she had her answer, and there Burke Denby found his.

CHAPTER II

An Only Son

PROUD, and blissfully happy in his victory, Burke went to his father; and to his father (so far as the latter himself was concerned) he carried a bombshell.

For two reasons John Denby had failed to see what was taking place in his own home. First, because it would never have occurred to him that his son could fall in love with a nursemaid; secondly, because he had systematically absented himself from the house during the most of his sister's visit, preferring to take his sister away with him for drives and walks rather than to stay in the noisy confusion of toys and babies that his home had become. Because of all this, therefore, he was totally unprepared for what his son was bringing to him.

He welcomed the young man with affectionate heartiness.

"Well, my boy, it's good to see you! Where have you been keeping yourself all these two weeks?"

"Why, dad, I've been right here—in fact, I've been very much right here!"

The conscious color that crept to the boy's forehead should have been illuminating. But it was not.

"Yes, yes, very likely, very likely," frowned the man. "But, of course, with so many around— But soon we'll be by ourselves again. Not but what I'm enjoying your aunt's visit, of course," he added hastily. "But here are two weeks of your vacation gone, and I've scarcely seen you a minute."

"Yes; and that's one thing I wanted to talk about—college," plunged in the boy. "I've decided I don't want to finish my course, dad. I'd rather go into business right away."

The man drew his brows together, but did not look entirely displeased.

"Hm-m, well," he hesitated. "While I should hate not to see you graduated, yet—it's not so bad an idea, after all. I'd be glad to have you here for good that much earlier, son. But why this sudden right-about-face? I thought you were particularly keen for that degree."

Again the telltale color flamed in the boyish cheeks.

"I was—once. But, you see, then I wasn't thinking of—getting married."

"Married!" To John Denby it seemed suddenly that a paralyzing chill clutched his heart and made it skip a beat. This possible future marriage of his son, breaking into their close companionship, was the dreaded shadow that loomed ever ahead. "Nonsense, boy! Time enough to think of that when you've found the girl."

"But I have found her, dad."

John Denby paled perceptibly.

"You have—what?" he demanded. "You don't mean that you've— Who is she?"

"Helen. Why, dad, you seem surprised," laughed the boy. "Haven't you noticed—suspected?"

"Well, no, I haven't," retorted the man grimly. "Why should I? I never heard of the young lady before. What is this—some college tomfoolery? I might have known, I suppose, what would happen."

"College! Why dad, she's here. You know her. It's Helen,—Miss Barnet."

"Here! There's no one here but your aunt and——" He stopped, and half started from his chair. "You don't—you can't mean—your aunt's nursemaid!"

At the scornful emphasis an indignant red dyed the boy's face.

"I didn't think that of you, dad," he rebuked.

Angry as he was, the man was conscious of the hurt the words gave him. But he held his ground.

"And I did not think this of you, Burke," he rejoined coldly.

"You mean——"

"I mean that I supposed my son would show some consideration as to the woman he chose for his wife."

"Father!" The boyish face set into stern lines. The boyish figure drew itself erect with a majesty that would have been absurd had it not been so palpably serious. "I can't stand much of this sort of thing, even from you. Miss Barnet is everything that is good and true and lovely. She is in every way worthy—more than worthy. Besides, she is the woman I love—the woman I have asked to be my wife. Please remember that when you speak of her."

John Denby laughed lightly. Sharp words had very evidently been on the end of his tongue, when, with a sudden change of countenance, he relaxed in his chair, and said:

"Well done, Burke. Your sentiments do you credit, I'm sure. But aren't we getting a little melodramatic? I feel as if I were on the stage of a second-rate theater! However, I stand corrected; and we'll speak very respectfully of the lady hereafter. I have no doubt she is very good and very lovely, as you say; but"—his mouth hardened a little—"I must still insist that she is no fit wife for my son."

"Why not?"

"Obvious reasons."

"I suppose you mean—because she has to work for her living," flashed the boy. "But that—excuse me—seems to me plain snobbishness. And I must say again I didn't think it of you, dad. I supposed——"

"Come, come, this has gone far enough," interrupted the distraught, sorely tried father of an idolized son. "You're only a boy. You don't know your own mind. You'll fancy yourself in love a dozen times yet before the time comes for you to marry."

"I'm not a boy. I'm a man grown."

"You're not twenty-one yet."

"I shall be next month. And I do know my own mind. You'll see, father, when I'm married."

"But you're not going to be married at present. And you're never going to marry this nursemaid."

"Father!"

"I mean what I say."

"You won't give your consent?"

"Never!"

"Then—I'll do it without, after next month."

There was a tense moment of silence. Father and son faced each other, angry resentment in their eyes. Then, with a sharp ejaculation, John Denby got to his feet and strode to the window. When he turned a minute later and came back, the angry resentment was gone. His mouth was stern, but his eyes were pleading. He came straight to his son and put both hands on his shoulders.

"Burke, listen to me," he begged. "I'm doing this for two reasons. First, to save you from yourself. You've known this girl scarcely two weeks—hardly an adequate preparation for a lifetime of living together. And just here comes in the second reason. However good and lovely she may be, she couldn't possibly qualify for that long lifetime together, Burke. Simply because she works for her living has nothing to do with it. She has not the tastes or the training that should belong to your wife—that must belong to your wife if she is to make you happy, if she is to take the place of—your mother. And that is the place your wife will take, of course, Burke."

Under the restraining hands on his shoulders the boy stirred restlessly.

"Tastes! Training! What do I care for that? She suits my tastes."

"She wouldn't—for long."

"You wait and see."

"Too great a risk to run, my boy."

"I'll risk it. I'm going to risk it."

Again there was a moment's silence. Again the stern lines deepened around the man's lips. Then very quietly there came the words:

"Burke, if you marry this girl, you will choose between her and me. It seems to me that I ought not to need to tell you that you cannot bring her here. She shall never occupy your mother's chair as the mistress of this house."

"That settles it, then: I'll take her somewhere else."

If Burke had not been so blind with passion he would have seen and felt the anguish that leaped to his father's eyes. But he did not stop to see or to feel. He snapped out the words, jerked himself free, and left the room.

This did not "settle it," however. There were more words—words common to stern parents and amorous youths and maidens since time immemorial. A father, appalled at the catastrophe that threatened, not only his cherished companionship with his only son, but, in his opinion, the revered sanctity of his wife's memory, wrapped himself in forbidding dignity. An impetuous lover, torn between the old love of years and the new, quite different one of weeks, alternately stormed and pleaded. A young girl, undisciplined, very much in love, and smarting with hurt pride and resentment, blew hot and cold in a manner that tended to drive every one concerned to distraction. As soon as possible a shocked, distressed Sister Eunice packed her trunks and betook herself and her offending household away.

In time, then, a compromise was effected. Burke should leave college immediately and go into the Works with his father, serving a short apprenticeship from the bottom up, as had been planned for him, that he might be the master of the business in deed as well as in name, when he should some day take his father's place. Meanwhile, for one year, he was not to see or to communicate with Helen Barnet. If at the end of the year he was still convinced that his only hope of happiness lay in marriage to this girl, all opposition would be withdrawn and he might marry when he pleased—though even then he must not expect to bring his bride to the old home. They must set up an establishment for themselves.

"We should prefer that,—under the circumstances," had been the prompt and somewhat haughty rejoinder, much to the father's discomfiture.

Grieved and dismayed as he was at the airy indifference with which his son appeared to face a fatherless future, John Denby was yet pinning his faith on that year of waiting. Given twelve months with the boy quite to himself, free from the hateful spell of this designing young woman, and there could be no question of the result—in John Denby's mind. In all confidence, therefore, and with every sense alert to make this year as perfect as a year could be, John Denby set himself to the task before him.

It was just here, however, that for John Denby the ghosts walked—ghosts of innumerable toy pistols and frosted cakes. Burke Denby, accustomed all his life to having what he wanted, and having it when he wanted it, moped the first week, sulked the second, covertly rebelled the third, and ran away the last day of the fourth, leaving behind him the customary note, which, in this case, read:

> Dear Dad: I've gone to Helen. I had to. I've lived a year of misery in this last month: so, as far as I am concerned, I have waited my year already. We shall be married at once. I wrote Helen last week, and she consented.
> Now, dad, you'll just have to forgive me. I'm twenty-one. I'm a man now, not a boy, and a man has to decide these things for himself. And Helen is a dear. You'll see, when you know her. We'll be back in two weeks. Now don't bristle up. I'm not going to bring her home, of course (at present), after the very cordial invitation you gave me not to! We're going into one of the Reddington apartments. With my allowance and my—er—wages (!) we can manage that all right—until "the stern parent" relents and takes his daughter home—as he should!
> Good-bye,
> BURKE.

John Denby read the letter once, twice; then he pulled the telephone toward him and gave a few crisp orders to James Brett, his general manager. His voice was steady and—to the man at the other end of the wire—ominously emotionless. When he had finished talking five minutes later certain words had been uttered that would materially change the immediate future of a certain willful youth just then setting out on his honeymoon.

There would be, for Burke Denby, no "Reddington apartment." There would also be no several-other-things; for there would be no "allowance" after the current month. There would be only the "wages," and the things the wages could buy.

There was no disputing the fact that John Denby was very angry. But he was also sorely distressed and grieved. Added to his indignation that his son should have so flouted him was his anguish of heart that the old days of ideal companionship were now gone forever. There was, too, his very real fear for the future happiness of his boy, bound in marriage to a woman he believed would prove to be a most uncongenial mate. But overtopping all, just now, was his wrath at the flippant assurance of his son's note, and the very evident confidence in a final forgiveness that the note showed. It was this that caused the giving of those stern, momentous orders over the telephone—John Denby himself had been somewhat in the habit of having his own way!

The harassed father did not sleep much that night. Until far into the morning hours he sat before the fireless grate in his library, thinking. He looked old, worn, and wholly miserable. In his hand, and often under his gaze, was the miniature of a beautiful woman—his wife.

CHAPTER III

Honeymoon Days

IT was on a cool, cloudy day in early September that Mr. and Mrs. Burke Denby arrived at Dalton from their wedding trip.

With characteristic inclination to avoid anything unpleasant, the young husband had neglected to tell his wife that they were not to live in the Denby Mansion. He had argued with himself that she would find it out soon enough, anyway, and that there was no reason why he should spoil their wedding trip with disagreeable topics of conversation. Burke always liked to put off disagreeable things till the last.

Helen was aware, it is true, that Burke's father was much displeased at the marriage; but that this displeasure had gone so far as to result in banishment from the home, she did not know. She had been planning, indeed, just how she would win her father-in-law over—just how sweet and lovely and daughterly she would be, as a member of the Denby household; and so sure was she of victory that already she counted the battle half won.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

New Discovery in Wireless

THE man who made transcontinental telephoning possible announced a few days ago that he had completed an invention that would free wireless telegraphy from static interference, much the same trouble that so long hindered the transcontinental telegraph. Wireless transmission has heretofore been subject to one serious handicap, a composite of atmospheric and physical troubles known to scientists as static interference. Under such conditions it is often impossible to get a wireless message through for days, and during portions of almost every day transmission is out of the question. Professor Pupin announced nearly a year ago that he believed he had solved the problem. He claims that the value of his invention in time of war would be tremendous, as it would give the side possessing it a great advantage over its foes. For that reason he intends that the United States shall be the first to possess it. Professor Pupin, who has been connected with the faculty of Columbia University for over twenty-five years, came to New York a poor, but ambitious immigrant boy from Serbia. He drifted out into the country as a common farm hand. The daughter of the farmer interested herself in the boy's education, and he went back to New York City, became a hard student, and by the discovery of God's secrets in nature has sent his name with his inventions around the globe. Who that accepts the fact of ocean telephoning or wireless telegraphy or telephoning will presume to deny the reality of prayer? Christ thus puts to an end all debate as to the efficacy of prayer: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find." (Matt. 7 : 7.)

Boy Back-Yard Gardener

HARRY KIRBY, who is called in Cincinnati the "champion boy back-yard farmer," is a scientific agriculturist. He is up before four o'clock every morning. His garden is 50 by 200 feet, nearly all up hill. He has spaded every foot of it himself, done all the planting, and expects to do all the harvesting, as he has been doing in the past four years. When Harry started in to make money out of his back yard four years ago, he was only nine years old. "I manage to keep ahead of the market. To do this I get up every day except Sunday at four, and get in four hours' work before school time. I have ripe tomatoes for sale when the other fellows are just about getting their plants started to growing good. I make from $160 to $200 a season out of my back-yard farm. I put it nearly all in the bank and only take out enough to buy seeds and plants," he says. The high cost of living and a social fad for back-yard gardening make the experiment of the boy farmer quite interesting, but God made boys to play. Harry will make a better rounded man if he plays healthful games with the other boys. We hope that Harry is putting his money away in the bank to help pay for a college course. It would not be surprising if the boy of today should catch from our age, crazy for money, the notion that laying away something in the bank is the first and main object in life. It is not. To raise fewer vegetables and have more fun, to give a part of the crop to the poor and hungry of the neighborhood, to acquire better scholarship, will make a larger and richer man than to work so hard to get a crop that the price of it may be laid away in the bank. Harry Kirby would make an ideal farmer, and we suspect that a boy so energetic, so smart and so constant as he will succeed in any calling to which his taste or conscience would lead him. The first man was an agriculturist. "Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken." (Gen. 3 : 23.)

Returns Stolen Farm

WHEN Michael Rice returned to Jackson County, Missouri, after sixteen years in the State of Washington, he found the Missouri River had restored to him with compound interest a farm of which it robbed him before he went away. A good many years ago Mr. Rice bought a tract of 120 acres on the south bank of the Missouri, near Atherton. By hard work he made the farm pay what he gave for it, $3,500, besides getting a living out of it for himself and family. Then the river's changing current began to eat away his valuable acres, and in a short time the tract had been reduced to a narrow fringe of ten or twelve acres. Driven from this home, he concluded to go West. Meanwhile the current of the river changed and brought him back his farm; not only his 120 acres, but forty acres more. God's energy is displayed in the natural world. Sometimes we can calculate with reference to it, and sometimes we cannot. Mr. Rice could calculate on the rich ground bringing the seed to harvest to pay for his farm, but did not know that the flow of the Missouri River was going to take it away. God directs the river currents. "He cutteth out rivers among the rocks." (Job 28 : 10.)

Rescued from Hell Gate

MRS. ELLEN DUFFY, standing on a pier in New York, fell into the East River and was caught by the furious current of the tide rushing through Hell Gate, when Ernest Fabrica, a boy fifteen years old, who was playing basket-ball near by, dived from the pier after her, not waiting to take off his coat. He swam to the woman and held her up, though they were dragged under the water several times. Edward Hemmel, a patrolman, jumped into the water and swam to the help of the boy. Hell Gate's current was too strong for them, and their cries for help brought the captain of a tug-boat, which rescued the three. Put a medal on this brave boy's breast, and on that of the heroic policeman, too; they teach us the value of life and how to live, to rescue our fellows from the current of sin in imitation of Christ, who came from heaven to make the race holy and save it from hell's gate. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John 3 : 16.)

Bear Fatally Hurts Bonavita

JACK BONAVITA, one of the famous wild animal trainers of the world, who, several years ago, in Bostock's show in Dreamland Park, Coney Island, New York, had his arm crushed by Baltimore, an angry lion, died the other day at Los Angeles, Calif., from injuries inflicted by an enraged polar bear with which he was performing in the cage. He was pulled out of the cage alive, but the furious beast had crushed his jaw and torn his face so that he died from the wounds. The man had a powerful will and all-daring courage, but in his desire to make the animals obey him and excite the feeling of horror in the audience, he often used the lash so severely as to keep the wild beasts on the line of danger to himself. In this extremely dangerous occupation the wonder is that such lamentable tragedies are not more frequent. There are wild beasts of passion that every now and then break loose and destroy. In the olden time there was a brave young man who had an encounter with a bear, with a result different from that which resulted in poor Bonavita's death. This is the reference to it: "The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine." (I Sam. 17 : 37.)

University's Evangelism

THE Y. M. C. A. branches of many of the colleges of the country are using what are called "deputations" for evangelical work. The Y. M. C. A. branch of the Syracuse University, through its general secretary, Mr. Charles W. Carlton, has just made a report of its deputation work this college year, which is of deep interest. Fifteen Gospel teams have been sent to as many communities, ranging in population from 400 to 1,000 persons. Each team, numbering from five to eight men in its membership, remains in a community from Friday night to Sunday night inclusive, visiting the people, attending local Sunday services, holding meetings and speaking at them, and having the climax in a great union Sunday night drive for souls. As a result of the deputations this academic year, more than 100 persons have decided to enter upon the Christian life. Several hundred have reconsecrated themselves to the service of the Master. There are more than fifty men in Syracuse University at the present time who have been out on deputation teams. Among these fifty men are a great many of the student leaders. More than a dozen block letter athletes are included in the fifty. There is observable a marked reaction for good on the lives of the men who participate in the work of these deputations. Only men who are avowed Christians are invited to go out on these teams. Eternity alone can measure the good the Young Men's Christian Association of the world has done for the advancement of God's kingdom, for the physical training, mental development, moral improvement, social enjoyment, and religious culture of young men. It must never forget that its highest and holiest function is to save souls. It was in agonizing prayer for the souls of young men that the organization had its birth, and it will continue to fulfil the sublime mission, making the physical, the intellectual, the social, all tributary to this supreme work. Of these soul-saving teams at Syracuse University and of other institutions of learning these beautiful words can be said: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." (Dan. 12 : 3)

Journalist's Large Bequest

JOHN M. WING, a veteran newspaper man who died in Chicago the other day, left $200,000 to the Newberry Library of Chicago. He began his career as reporter on the Utica, N. Y., Observer. He multiplied his healthful personality in his profession of journalism, and he will multiply it in the good books that will be read for generations to come. His bequest illustrating this teaching of Christ: "Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick." (Matt. 5 : 15.)

Mindanao Strikes Oil

WORD has come through a Manila paper that oil has been discovered in Mindanao, the southern island of the Philippine group. These oil fields are greater than any others known in the Philippines, and rich beyond computation. They are in the district surrounding Lake Lando, and the tale of the find, spreading like wildfire, has caused a rush to the region which can only be compared to the mad scramble which followed the announcement of the gold to be had in the Klondike. It is not likely that the Bible lands knew anything about mineral oils. They relied upon vegetable oils, especially that of the olive, for purposes of illumination. It is doubtless this kind of oil of which the prophet speaks in these words: "Then will I make their waters deep, and cause their rivers to run like oil, saith the Lord God." (Ezek. 32 : 14.)

Glimpsing the Kingdom

ONE of the boldest thinkers in England is Herbert George Wells, whose writings on the war and its problems have enjoyed a wide circulation on this side of the Atlantic. In one of his books he has given a powerful and vivid picture of the sacrifice and suffering entailed by the great conflict on groups of friends of opposing nationalities, and the uselessness and wicked folly of it all. His latest book, "War and the Future," is of still deeper moral significance. Organized Christianity he finds sadly disappointing; it is unable even to influence much less to settle the world's quarrels. Nothing short of "the world Kingdom of God" can do it, he concludes. "And the spirit of collective service was never so strong and never so manifestly spreading and increasing as it is today. But service to what? I believe that this impulse to collective service can satisfy itself only under the formula that mankind is one state, of which God is the undying King, and that the service of men's collective needs is the true worship of God." He has searched industriously for indications preparing for the world Kingdom, over which the Almighty would reign as the Invisible King, but can find no indications of any preparations. Yet, he writes: "It seems to me incredible that men should not rise up out of this muddy, bloody wastefulness of a world war with a resolution to end forever the shams, the prejudices, the pretenses and habits that have impoverished their lives, slaughtered our sons, and wasted the world—a resolution so powerful and sustained that nothing can withstand it. But it is not apparent that any such will arise. Does it appear at all? I see scarcely a measurable step made anywhere toward that world Kingdom of God, which is, I assert, the manifest solution, the only formula that can bring peace to all mankind. Mankind as a whole seems to have learnt nothing in thirty months of war.

"To me this war, this slaughter of eight or nine million people, is due almost entirely to this almost universal lack of clearheadedness; I believe that the share of wickedness in making war is quite secondary to the share of this universal shallow silliness of outlook. These effigies of emperors and kings and statesmen that lead men into war, these legends of nationality and glory, would collapse before our universal derision, if they were not stuffed tight and full with the unthinking folly of the common man."

Outside of and apart from the great conflict, he finds a deep religious revival, leading toward the realization of the Kingdom of God. "What I conceive to be the reality of the religious revival is to be found in quarters remote from the religious professionals. . . . In the last few years, I have developed a religious belief that has become now to me as real as any commonplace fact. . . . The time draws near when mankind will awake, and the dreams will fade away, and then there will be no nationality in all the world but humanity; no king, no emperor, no leader, but the one God of mankind. That is my faith.

"I conceive myself to be thinking as the world thinks, and if I find no great facts, I find a hundred little indications to reassure me that God comes. Even those who have neither the imagination nor the faith to apprehend God as a reality will, I think, realize presently that the Kingdom of God over a world-wide system of republican states is the only possible formula under which we may hope to unify and save mankind. This conviction that the world Kingdom of God is the only true method of human service is clear and final in my own mind, and seems inevitably the conviction to which all right-thinking men must ultimately come."

This is the confession of one who, feeling keenly the thrust of the war and the gigantic sin and folly of it all, has reached the same conclusion that other earnest minds sought and found nearly thirty centuries ago. Essentially the discovery of Mr. Wells is no new thing in the spiritual life of the world, but is rather a restatement of that which Isaiah and other prophets foreshadowed as the world's hope. Never was the realization of that hope more urgently needed or desired than now, and never have indications been so marked to show that it is drawing nearer. The trouble is that the world has been satisfied to grope along in the dark, when God's Word, which is a light to every soul that seeks its counsel, would have illumined the way.

The Real Success

ACHIEVEMENT is not always success, while reputed failure often is. The most successful men are not necessarily the ones noisily attracting public attention. The best and most useful women are not the bright butterflies of fashion or the stage, whose press agents incessantly flaunt their pictures and their doings before the public.

No! No!

The unlauded men and women who are quietly attending to their own little duties, every day contributing something substantial to industry, prosperity and progress, rearing children in habits of work and right living, and supplying examples that elevate the moral and intellectual level of their little communities—these are the men and women of real influence and power.

Success is theirs in the fullest measure.

It is not given us all to have success as gorgeous as the rainbow. But no matter. Success consists in doing one's best. Indeed, the real success is more in the trying than in the achievement. We may achieve by accident, by help of others, by chance conditions, or by other forces that are not ours. But our efforts are all our own. It is our purposes and our efforts that are a part of our very selves.

How shrunken and pitiful a thing, how hollow a delusion, is the shining so-called success of self-absorbed men and women! They have only the husks of life's golden grain. Like that soldier under Galerius who found a shining leather bag filled with pearls, and cast away the pearls but carefully preserved the bag, these self-absorbed ones are spurning true riches, real success, to hug to their hearts things that are empty and worthless.

Mothers and Children First

"IF it had not been for the American relief, we would have starved. The food sent from America kept our babies alive. But for it they would not have survived."

"Women and Children First" is a splendid motto for the war relief work. What the mothers of France are reported by the cable as having declared about the American relief saving them and their little ones is true of every part of the desolated world to which the war has penetrated, and every land to which relief has been sent by the Christian Herald War Widows and Orphans Fund. The mothers of Belgium, of Poland, of Serbia, of Galicia, of Armenia, Syria and Persia—and the mothers of the land where the Saviour of the world was once a little child—if they were questioned, would speak the language of love and gratitude for the help America has sent to them in their time of sore trial.

"Mothers and Babies First!" Let us not forget that they have the strongest claim upon our generosity, the greatest right to our tender consideration. Central Europe is a tangle of war, which unfortunately interrupts relief work for the time being. But in Syria, Armenia, Persia and Palestine the mothers are looking with eager hope toward the great, rich Western Republic. They are praying that it may continue its efforts to save them and their little ones. Much has been done in their behalf, but to assure their safety until the crisis is past we must do much more. Remember, every gift you send now may be the means of saving the life of a mother or a little child.

The Russian Church and the Revolution

ONE of the "signs of the times" is the news that the Holy Synod of the Russian Church has declared unreservedly in support of the revolution. "Inasmuch as the Lord holds in his hands the fate of the kingdom and its peoples, we exhort our members to obey the new government and fulfil their duty as Christian citizens——" Thus runs the message, which has been ordered to be read in all the churches throughout the nation. It is evident that the Synod, which has always been the ally of the despotic government and the stanchest enemy of education and freedom of worship, has decided it to be the part of wisdom to go with the tide. Its untrammeled exercise of authority over the ignorant masses of the Russian people has made a strange record. One who evidently knows the methods of the Russian Church in politics in the past gives this terse illustration of its control of the illiterate multitudes: "An election would be impossible without the active aid of the parish priest. The Synod has accepted the authority of the Duma government. The hierarchy will issue its orders to the bishops; the bishops will pass the word along to the protopops or archpriests; the protopops will convey the instructions to the pops, or parish priests, the priests will speak to the peasantry, and the peasants will cast their vote, which will decide the future of the most populous democracy in the world." Clearly, the permanency of the republic must depend largely upon the attitude of the church, and on its absolute loyalty to the new order of things. If the republic should be firmly established, freedom of worship would be among the first of its reforms. This will mean the gradual decline of the church as a political power. The enfranchisement of 100,000,000 ignorant peasants from the control of a despotic church, is one of the weightiest problems the new republic has to face.

A Prisoner in a Crock

AN earthenware crock, which a boy, playing policeman, had put on his head as a helmet, slipped down and stuck fast. The boy made a record resignation from the police force, and his muffled howls attracted prompt attention.

His alarmed mother tugged at the crock until the boy's face was sorely bruised; then excited neighbors took turns at it until his neck was painfully twisted.

Meanwhile, the howling boy was suffering terrifying visions of life-long imprisonment, as secure as in a dungeon, and of his head from year to year growing larger and tighter in the crock. The poor boy's trouble shut him in from all the rest of the world with an ingrowing imagination. But that is only what any one's trouble of any sort is apt to do for one.

The mother, the father, who had been sent for, and a half-hundred neighbors, who had invited themselves under the delusion that curiosity is sympathy, finally settled down to solemn conclave and decided that, since the crock had slipped on, it must be possible for it to be slipped off again, but that only a skilful surgeon could perform the delicate operation.

A delegation was on its way with the boy to a surgeon's office, when a resourceful motorman, seeing the situation, smashed the crock with his controller-handle.

Thus, by the simplest of processes, the boy's trouble was suddenly ended. And it is by equally simple and direct processes that most of the troubles of most of us may be ended.

With our heads stuck fast in worries, we rack our brains over a thousand roundabout ways of slipping them off—and the harder we tug at them the more they hurt—but we overlook the simple expedient of smashing the crock.

Like the lad, we see terrifying visions of the future; we suffer our feelings to be cruelly lacerated and our bodies to be twisted and torn in mental anguish and despair; we run here and there for sympathy and advice and help; and it does not occur to us at all how easy it is just to break the crock.

Most of the crocks that seem to slip down over our heads are merely imaginary, anyway. They require no street-car controller-handles to smash them. All they call for is a mental controller-handle.

Did it never occur to you that most of our troubles come, as this lad's did, through our trying to appear what we aren't?

Heralds of Spring

IN the early springtime, as a new morning bursts upon the world, bird voices are heard in hallelujah chorus of joy and thanksgiving to the Creator, as if saying, "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord!" The flowers and grasses, the sighing winds and murmuring waters join in the acclamations of delight, "Let us magnify his name forever!" Mountains and hills break forth into singing, and all the trees clap their hands for joy, "For his mercy endureth forever." Oh, that men were as faithful in their worship and thanksgiving as the singing birds and rolling spheres. Then there would be no discordant notes in their songs.

The wondrous beauty of bird plumage, songs and life have been a favorite theme of our poets. Jesus himself took the birds for a text when he said, "Ye are of more value than many sparrows——"

"If he so care for these weak, tiny creatures,
O soul distressed, doth he not care for thee?
Can he not read, in all thy anguished features,
Thy mute appeal against the things that be?
Our Father careth—cease thy vain repinings;
All that thou needest he will send to thee:
Mercy and love through all the intertwinings
Of the mysterious ways of his decree."

FIRST SERMON OF THE GREAT REVIVAL*

Preached by Evangelist W. A. SUNDAY

TEXT—Acts 19 : 2. "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?"

THE personality, the divinity and the attributes of the Holy Ghost afford one of the most inspiring, one of the most beneficial examples in our spiritual life. We are told that when the Holy Spirit came at Pentecost, he came as the rushing of a mighty wind, and oversurging expectancy. When Jesus was baptized in the River Jordan, of John, out from the expanse of heaven was seen to float the Spirit of God like a snowflake, and they heard a sound as of whirling wings, and the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove hovered over the dripping locks of Christ.

Neither your eyes nor mine will ever behold such a scene; neither shall our ears ever hear such a sound again. You cannot dissect or weigh the Holy Spirit, nor analyze him as a chemist may analyze material matter in his laboratory, but we can all feel the pulsing of the breath of the eternal Spirit.

Why, an angel of heaven could not come to you here and live two weeks and loaf with the people you loaf with, and then return to heaven without first being disinfected and fumigated and given a bath in lysol and carbolic acid.

What the Holy Spirit Is

The Holy Spirit is a personality, and not merely an influence, and the Spirit of God is sensitive; hence this injunction, "Grieve not the Spirit of God." The ordinances of the church never saved a soul and never will, but it is the Holy Spirit, and this Spirit is a personality and analogous to the love of a mother for her child who has gone wrong and brought shame upon her fair name—the love of God for the erring, sin-cursed world. It is the same as the grief of a wife whose husband has broken his marriage vows as if they were made of spider webs.

As to the doctrine of future probation, I say if a man doesn't settle his future before the undertaker pumps the embalming fluid into him, then he's a goner.

It is my desire to give you a brief outline of the Holy Spirit—to bring God into spiritual touch with man. I want to say to you that I do not believe in the universal Fatherhood of God, or the universal brotherhood of man, either. You are not a child of God unless you are a Christian, but if you are not a child of God, you are a creature of God; so is the saloon-keeper, the gambler, the madame of the red light.

There must be a link to connect the infinite to the finite. The Holy Spirit is the means of this communication.

Joshua fighting a battle for God said that the sun would set, and it would grow dark before he would be able to finish this battle.

"Just make the sun stand still a little while and prolong this day till I whip that bunch to a frazzle, and it will send your name ringing down through the ages," he said to God, and God reached up and grabbed the sun and said: "Stay there, don't move until my servant Joshua gives you the high ball."

Work of the Apostle Paul

Samson with the Holy Spirit upon him could take the jawbone of an ass and lay dead one thousand Philistines. Samson without the Holy Spirit was as weak as a new-born babe, and they poked his eyes out and cut off his locks, and so with the church and her members.

Wherever the Apostle Paul went he had either a revival or a riot. He had been on the firing line for Jesus Christ for years and never once dipped his colors.

He visited Corinth and when he stepped into the inn he noticed a gang of men talking on the corner. He went to the hotel-keeper and said:

"Who is that bunch over there?"

"Why, they're the church people here in Corinth," answered the proprietor.

"Not on your life," answered St. Paul, "not that gang."

Then St. Paul went over into the corner and said: "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?"

"Never heard of it," said one of the men.

Paul said, "We are living in a new dispensation of grace, and salvation is offered free to all who will accept."

We are all made of one blood and one man. Because you rode here today in an automobile instead of hoofing it, does not make you any better. And because you may wear a diamond as big as a hickory nut in your shirtfront doesn't make you any better.

When God built the universe he spoke and the Holy Spirit had the work done. When God wills, the Holy Spirit will give this city a new life of sobriety and decency.

Egotism a Danger

One of the greatest dangers, as I see it, to the church is the egotistical, selfish contentment of men. That is the curse of the world today. Because you think your hope of heaven is sure, you don't care a rap whether the other fellow is saved; if you are happy, you don't care whether the other man suffers or not.

A man won't walk to a precipice and fling himself over it with his eyes open; a man, unless he is a fool or crazy, will never stand on a railroad track and contest his strength with steel and steam. The hidden traps of justice are more fatal than the seen traps. Satan can plume himself in the guise of a dove of light, and in that disguise he does his most effective work. If you knew the devil he would not be getting so many people to walk the paths of vice, and the way to heaven would not be so deserted.

The danger to the tired traveler is not that he will walk too far out on the beach and the incoming tide engulf him. If a man says to me, "I have never been a drunkard," I say, "God be praised that your wife has never known what it was to see you stagger in, and vomit, and maunder and mutter, and blaspheme in her presence; God be praised that your children have never known what it is to walk the streets and have the finger of scorn pointed at them; God be praised that they have never sat around a stove and shivered because you have nothing to buy coal because you must drink; that they have never gone to bed hungry for something to eat that you might drink; that you have never known what it is to have the wolf of drink gnaw at your heart and pull at your vitals like a hungry wolf."

A Typical Billy Sunday Prayer

"O LORD, sweep over this city and save the business men of this community, the young men and women. O God, save us all from the cesspools of hell and corruption and the ranks of that miserable God-forsaken crew who are feeding, fattening and gormandizing on the people. Get everybody interested in honesty, and decency, and sobriety, and make them fight to the last ditch for God. There are too many cowards, four-flushers in the church."

One man said to me: "Bill, I have never been tempted to sidestep; I have never been tempted to forge; I have always been true to my marriage vows." I know that, but are you willing that the world shall see you as God sees you? God sees everything. Are you willing that the world shall see you as God does? God is going to reach this old world by and through the people who believe and live and preach the truth.

Three Classes in the Church

There are three classes in the church, as I have looked at them from my standpoint. The first are those in the church personally who want to be saved, but they are not concerned about other people. They do not give any help to other people; they don't lie awake at night praying for other people that they might be brought to the Lord. The second class are going to depend upon human wisdom—there is no such thing as latent power, expressed or implied—power is just as distinctive in an individual as the electricity in these lights. If these globes are without a current they would be nothing but glass bulbs fit for nothing but the scrap heap. Without the Holy Spirit you are as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals, and a third-rate amusement parlor, with religion left out. The church of today needs a flood of the Holy Ghost. The third class are church members, not from might and honor and power, but from the Spirit.

I am not a pessimist; no, I am an optimist of optimists; and I believe that a brighter day never dawned on the church of Jesus and that there was never a time when men and women were so hungry for the true religion as they are today. I believe that the church of God never had brighter prospects and I believe that down by the door of the church today there are rolling such chances as it never had before.

There are more people ready and willing to hear the Gospel than ever before. I believe that no church door should ever swing open; no sermon should ever be preached; no songs should ever be sung; no meeting should ever be held that is not for the only object of the bringing of men and women to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

Too Much Organization

We've got churches; lots of them. We've got preachers' seminaries and they are turning out preachers and putting them into little theological molds and keeping them there until they get cold enough to practice preaching.

Why, at Pentecost one sermon saved three thousand people; now it takes three thousand to get one old buttermilk-eyed, red-nosed, whisky-soaked blasphemer.

No people on God's earth are better clothed and better fed than in America, so this is not what is wrong.

A fellow came to me and said, "Billy, the trouble is that we need organization in the church." God help us! We're organized too much today. There is so much organization in the church that you can hear the machinery squeak, but we haven't got oil enough of the Holy Ghost to grease one axle of God's chariot. Listen to me. We've got the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Y. P. S. C. E., the W. C. T. U., the I. P. X., the J. E. L. and the J. e. l. l. y.

Drop into a young people's meeting. The leader will say, in a weak, effeminate, apologetic, negative sort of voice, that there was a splendid topic this evening, but he had not much time for preparation. It is superfluous for him to say that; you could have told that.

He goes along and tells how happy he is to have you there to take part this evening, making this meeting interesting. Some one gets up and reads a poem from the Christian Endeavor Herald and then they sing No. 38. They get up and sing, "Oh to Be Nothing, Nothing; Only to Sit at His Feet." We used to sing that song, but I found out that they took it so literally that I cut it out, the same as I have cut song out of my preaching.

A Lesson from Hell Gate

Then a long pause, and some one says "Let us sing No. 52." So they get up and then some one starts "Throw Out the Life-Line." They haven't got strength enough to put up a clothesline. Another long pause, and then you hear, "Have all taken part that feel free to do so? We have a few minutes left. So let us sing No. 23." Then another long pause. I hear the organ—I can never think of that little thing—what is it? prelude? "It is time for us to close; now let us all repeat together our Mizpah benediction: 'The Lord keep watch between thee and me, when we are absent from one another.'" I tell you, God has got a hard job on his hands. Ever hear anything like that? Yes, I guess you have, and you don't have to go outside to hear it, either.

The church of God doesn't need organization, but the Holy Ghost upon what she has already got. Life will give organization, but organization will never give spiritual life. God is needed to bring man to feel that he needs Jesus Christ. The divine philosophy of people today breeds more agnostics and infidels than all the Bob Ingersolls put together.

God is looking today for men to go down into the marshes of sin to rescue the perishing and care for the dying.

Did you ever read or hear about the blowing up of Hell Gate at New York? Only ships of certain drafts could go through it, and the government gave the contract to General Newton to remove the obstacle. So he started with his tunnels under the banks of the river, placed his tons of powder and giant powder, and on the day appointed the government ships came and put everything back that attempted to pass through the river, and General Newton sat in his home on Brooklyn Heights, two miles away, his little child on his knee, and he said, "When I tell you, press that little black button and push." And when the signal came to him over the telephone, he said, "Press that button," and she pressed the button, and two miles away there was a muffled roar and the water shot into the air 150 feet and the river was cleared.

Helpless itself was that little child, but backed by the genius and power of her illustrious father she was all powerful. Helpless are we without the Holy Ghost, but with it we are all powerful and nothing in all hell can stop us.

Urges Belief in God

Believe that God Almighty can do something; don't whine around as though God was a corpse, ready for the undertaker. God is still on the job. The Holy Spirit is needed to bring man in spiritual touch with God, to make man realize that he is a representative of God on earth today.

Did you ever realize that you were God's representative? Did you know what that means? Suppose we insulted or killed Ambassador Spring-Rice of England, and that we refused to apologize or pay an indemnity or make any effort to appease England, what would it mean?

It would mean that England would come across to this country with her soldiers and we would dye the soil of Canada with the blood of brave men, and they would dye the soil of the United States with the blood of brave men, and for what? You today, as representatives of the Lord, can step out and in the name of the Holy Spirit say to the forces of sin to come out. I defy every one of the dirty bunch of you.

Come on, you forces of iniquity in this city, that have made the church a cuspidor and a doormat to wipe your dirty feet on; come on, you traducers; come on, you triple extract of infamy; come on, you assassins of character; come on, you sponsors of harlotry; come on, you defamers of God and enemies of the church; come on, you bull-necked, beetle-browed, hog-jowled,

The Edward Wesley Company, Cincinnati, Ohio

peanut-brained, weasel-eyed four-flushers, false alarms and excess baggage. In the name of God, I challenge and defy you. It is mighty easy to lie about a man when he isn't on the job. I'm here now. Come on and I'll deliver the goods, express prepaid.

A man said to me: "It was a mighty little thing to drive Adam and Eve out of the Garden of Eden because they ate an apple." God didn't give a rap about the apple. It was the principle—whether man should bow to God or God bow to man. That act was an act of disobedience.

Boston's Tea Party

You may say it was a mighty little thing for England to go to war with us because we threw some tea into Boston Harbor. We didn't go to war over the tea. We said: "You can't brew tea in the East India Company and pour it down our throats." It was the principle we went to war about, not the price of tea, and we fought it out.

Are you ready to surrender? You who are in rebellion against the authority of God's government? Are you ready to do his will?

You recall the strenuous times in China during the famous Boxer uprising and how the various legations of foreign nations were in great danger of assassination by the Boxers. How, on one critical occasion, when the hour looked the darkest and the cooped-up refugees were looking anxiously for relief, the Germans were cheered by hearing the bands of their soldiers marching in and playing "Die Wacht am Rhein"; the French heard the "Marseillaise," and the English were cheered by the music of "God Save the King," and how the Americans waited and wondered if their soldiers were coming to their relief; and when through the night pealed the strains of "The Star-Spangled Banner," "Dixie," "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," and those stirring, patriotic airs as the field representatives of our government came to the rescue, you remember the feeling it brought to those people.

What did it all mean? It meant that Minister Conger, his wife and daughter and other loyal Americans were in danger, and for their protection this government would stop at nothing.

Fighting for a Principle

If necessary the treasury would have been emptied in their defense; every soldier would have been sent to their relief and every battleship and other fighting apparatus of the navy would have been at their disposal. And for what? The preservation of a principle.

Are you fighting for a principle? Do you quake and quiver in your boots every time a brewer blows his nose? Let me urge you to get out and fight. Come on, you God's representatives! Come on!

Getting Ready for Mr. Sunday

IN the last week of March, New York City's anticipations and expectations regarding the great Sunday campaign began to approach realization in actual events. According to the program the tabernacle was to be dedicated on Palm Sunday, April 1, at 3 o'clock. Governor Whitman was scheduled to make the principal address of the afternoon, and the combined choirs of nearly 5,000 voices were to be first heard at this service. Mr. Sunday, following the close of his campaign at Buffalo, went to his home at Winona Lake in Indiana for a needed rest before the beginning of the three months' hard fight in New York City. He was not expected to be present at the dedication of the tabernacle, but the Sunday spirit was there.

As the preliminary work approached its culmination, it became evident that the Sunday spirit was to have an efficient ally in a new spirit of cooperation, a new spirit of spiritual achievement which has come to possess the more than 300 cooperating churches, their ministers and their people. New York expects great things of the Sunday campaign because New York has seen a vision of big things to do, and it believes that Billy Sunday is God's messenger for this special purpose.

ON Sunday, March 18, 1,000 men packed the Union Methodist Church on West Forty-eighth Street in Manhattan to hear two men who had hit the trail tell how it happened. One of them was Al Saunders, who was a fish merchant in Scranton, Pa., and leader in a jovial band who always got home, and who were proud of their ability to drink and get away with it. Mr. Saunders went to the tabernacle "to prove that Billy Sunday was a fraud" and stayed to pray that Saunders might be forgiven. It took several meetings to bring about this transformation, but having started, Saunders couldn't stop until he had gone the whole road, and now he is going about the country telling other men how Billy Sunday's colloquial speech, which some people call "slang," got under the hide of his self-sufficiency after he had lived for twenty years in a town with thousands of Christian people without ever being asked to attend a church.

Mr. A. B. McDonald, who reported the Sunday meetings for the Kansas City Star, although a moral man, had thoroughly satisfied himself that the religion of Jesus Christ was all buncombe. He was an intellectual atheist and rather proud of it. It was his business to report the tabernacle meetings, and his atheism slowly dissolved in the spiritual temperature of the Sunday campaign. Mr. McDonald came to New York, at the urgent invitation of Mr. Sunday, in order to tell what the Sunday campaign had done in a permanent way for Kansas City. He told of the old First Presbyterian Church, which had been about to sell its property because crowded by business on every side. Its congregation had dwindled to a mere fifty and its Sunday school to a meager twelve. Today, the First Presbyterian Church has a morning men's Bible class of 600 and an afternoon class of 1,000, while other churches in Kansas City are finding it necessary to house their new Bible classes in temporary structures and in tents because their auditoriums are too small. Before the Sunday campaign was over in Kansas City the bookstores had sold out of Bibles and had purchased all the floating stock in Chicago, and today the Bible is still far and away the "best seller" in the bookstores of the Missouri Valley metropolis. In addition to these men's Bible classes, Kansas City is sending out Gospel teams of men who first heard the message of salvation from the lips of Mr. Sunday, and who are now giving their time on Sundays and week evenings to carry the message to other men.

In Boston the Billy Sunday Business Men's Club is already sending out Gospel teams into other New England towns. The Boston Transcript bears testimony to the permanent results of the Sunday campaign, calling special attention to the St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church at Watertown, which previous to January, 1917, had been in the habit of holding union services on Sunday evenings with two other congregations, at which services the attendance did not reach fifty per cent. of the present Sunday evening audiences at each church alone, while the attendance at the weekly prayer meetings has increased over 500 per cent.

THE Buffalo campaign closed on March 25, when over 60,000 people heard Mr. Sunday in four meetings and the trail-hitting records of the Buffalo campaign were broken, 5,086 persons grasping the evangelist's hand during the day. The total number of trail-hitters in the Buffalo campaign is given as 35,785. The Boston record was 46,838. The free-will offering for Mr. Sunday in Buffalo was $42,204.74. On the last Sunday evening 17,000 people, 2,000 more than the rated capacity of the tabernacle, crowded in to hear Mr. Sunday's last address and the papers stated that more than 15,000 were unable to get in. There were 104 cooperating churches in the Buffalo campaign, and the cost, exclusive of Mr. Sunday's special offering, was about $60,000. The attendance for the entire campaign is reckoned in excess of 1,000,000.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian Herald in Buffalo has sent us this interesting little article regarding the "tabernacle face":

"The street cars in Buffalo which carry the crowd to the scene of action are filled with men and women, boys and girls, all headed toward the spot to which an extraordinary man with a personality draws the people. Their faces as they approach this unusual gathering are not the same faces they wear when they are on their way to a circus; they are not the faces they carry when they are going to see a good show; they are not the faces they wear when they go to church, if they ever do. They have the 'tabernacle face,' with a happy look about the eyes, and every one thinks that the other fellow feels like he does, and the mutual understanding of the crowd is positively delightful. People talk to one another—strangers side by side—who under any other circumstances would never think of speaking one to the other, the light banter of the crowd is new to itself, it is almost a rollicking, happy-go-lucky air that carries it and sweeps it along to its destination. The spirit of the crowd adds to its own number, for all the world loves a glad hand! Its atmosphere is created by the knowledge that it is to be met in a serious question on its own ground and in its own tongue; for he seeks those in the world he has known best—the world of the people!

"We have all kinds of faces with us—but when Billy Sunday arrives in our midst there is a new face gracing our streets—it is the 'tabernacle face,' which follows the campaign wherever it takes root. It is not a face we will turn our eyes from; it is an expression that comes as refreshing as the spring; it is good to look upon."

ONE of the most interesting parts of the work in New York, as elsewhere, is the work for the women. The Business Women's Invitation Committee of the W. A. Sunday Evangelistic Campaign is composed of women who in less than three months have managed very thoroughly to get in touch with practically all the women working in our largest city. They have interested these women in the meetings, have enlisted their help in the musical program, and in most cases have obtained their promise to come to at least one meeting.

The Business Women's Invitation Committee is divided into three parts—the Central Division, the Extension Division, and the Luncheon Division. The chairman of the Central Division is Mrs. Simeon Chapin. She has control over the five sections that the Central Division is divided into, namely, store, office building, telephone exchange, business college, and street sections. Mrs. Warner M. Leeds is the chairman of the Extension Division, which is also divided into five sections—factories, laundries, hospitals, hotels and restaurants, and homes. The chairman of the Luncheon Division is Mrs. Stephen Baker, and her division takes care of three branches of work—luncheons, ushers and music.

A representative of the Christian Herald saw and talked with Mrs. Davis, the general chairman of the Business Women's Invitation Committee, in her home on Madison Avenue. She told her the working plan of the earnest body of women who are doing their best to assure the success of the Billy Sunday meetings in New York.

"We," she said, "have established a regular method which we use with all women except the ones that are employed in homes. Those, of course, must be approached in a very different manner.

"First of all, some woman acquainted with the head of a factory, store or laundry calls at the owner's office and asks if she may talk with the girls employed by his company. If the permission is granted, and in most cases it is, she holds a meeting, telling the girls about the Billy Sunday Campaign, and asking them to cooperate with her and the other members of the Invitation Committee. She usually asks two capable women employed in the store or factory to help her keep in touch with the girls, as it would be impossible for her to see them as often as she would like to herself. In this way she interests the girls in the meetings and makes sure of their attendance. Under the supervision of the Luncheon Committee, four days a week lunches are being served at the cost of ten cents each in three New York churches. After the luncheon is served there is a short prayer meeting in the chapel of the church and a song service."

The executives of the Business Women's Invitation Committee represent some of the best-known families in the country. They are Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mrs. Herman O. Armour, Mrs. Stephen Baker, Mrs. William Borden, Miss Anna C. Brush, Mrs. James S. Cushman, Mrs. James C. Colgate, Mrs. John B. Calvert, Mrs. Simeon Chapin, Mrs. J. Frederick Crombie, Mrs. Henry Fletcher, Mrs. E. R. T. Gould, Miss Emma Hayes, Mrs. Warner N. Leeds, Mrs. D. Hunter McAlpin, Mrs. James M. Montgomery, Mrs. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Mrs. Finley J. Shepard, Mrs. W. H. Wollverton and Mrs. Henry F. Tilge.

[As the campaign progresses the Christian Herald will follow the work of this committee through its various activities and will tell the readers of the Herald just how the women of New York are being reached and helped and organized.]

The Overflowing Harvest in India

THE Christian religion has been spreading widely in our section this year. The times have been very bitter from the terrible war, and people long for something on which they can really depend. About six thousand converted souls came to us almost in a mass at Ragapur. The handful of pastors are struggling to instruct, organize, evangelize them, but it is difficult with an illiterate people, though each pastor takes twelve to twenty villages and itinerates continually. The people throng to any means of grace, implore more preachers, organize class meetings and praying bands and schools, build rude meeting-houses, and do all that is possible in extreme poverty. A great resource is found in hymns. They are a very musical race, and they learn and assimilate the hymns rapidly. O. David translates and composes them admirably, and they fly from village to village. The people long to be set free from the demons and witches of the past, and all the miserable accompaniments of caste, child marriage, and consequent immorality and short life. Caste means inevitable and extreme poverty and disease of the majority.

Complicated with this year's war taxes in national defense, disease has broken out all over India in the plague. Pastor Ramiah buried thirteen in a night, Pastor Simon has been to us twice for lymph and medicine. His poor people have fled from their huts and are camping miserably in the jungle under the lash of the monsoon. Quarantined there, without relief, medicine, work, wages, food, hope, the mortality is frightful. They built him a hut there among the rest of them, and they let him out of quarantine to get medicine.

Christianity has extraordinary power to unite, uplift, relieve; preaching is necessary, but rapid growth depends on its passing from neighbor to neighbor in a community. Our Bible school men live on dry rice at five cents a day; speak out with eloquence and force, stimulate each other in the work; and soon graduate and are out as preachers. The mission unites them for a new life, rouses them to higher thought, fills them with graver purpose. The Spirit which has fallen upon them divides to every man as he wills, and a nation seems indeed to be born in a day, nor is anything impossible to them that believe.

IF you will keep your motor free from carbon. That knocking in your engine—the difficulty you have climbing hills—poor pick-up—lack of power—noisy motor—pre-ignition—in fact 80% of engine trouble is caused by carbon. Clean it out with and your engine will run like it did the first 500 miles, quietly and full of "pep". And your gasoline consumption will drop from 12% to 20%.

You Can Do It Yourself

For 25c—five minutes' time—and with no labor you, yourself, can remove all carbon deposits. Simply pour an ounce of Johnson's Carbon Remover into each cylinder—allow it to remain from 2 to 12 hours and then drive your car 10 or 15 miles. You will be surprised at the wonderful improvement.

How It Works

Johnson's Carbon Remover does not eat the carbon, but releases it from the metal and softens it into a jelly-like, inflammable mass. Then, as the engine is operated, the mass burns, pulverizes and is blown out through the exhaust in powdered form.

Use It Every 1,000 Miles

If you will use Johnson's Carbon Remover at regular intervals giving carbon no chance to accumulate, you will automatically eliminate most valve trouble and your engine will always be at its highest efficiency.

Help the "Household of Faith"

FROM the many letters which the Christian Herald is now receiving, it is evident that our appeal in behalf of the suffering multitudes of Syria, Armenia and Persia has fallen on sympathetic ground. These unfortunate nations are, in the most literal way, sufferers by the great war. Rendered homeless and destitute, robbed of all their worldly possessions, and forced by relentless foes to seek refuge in the wilderness, where thousands have perished through starvation and exposure, those who are left, mainly women and children, are in a far more pitiable plight than any pen could describe. But they are not merely sufferers from the presence of war, which has robbed them of their bread-winners, and made them exiles; they are persecuted because they are Christians. This gives them a double claim on the sympathy of Christian America. Thousands of Syrian families, which a little over two years ago were comparatively happy and contented, are now broken and dispersed; their fathers and brothers have met the fate of Christian martyrdom at the hands of the Moslems, and they themselves must fall victims, unless the Christian world comes to their rescue.

Mrs. N. M., Manitou, Okla., in sending her contribution to the Christian Herald Relief Fund for Syria, Persia and Armenia, writes: "I wish to help these poor people in their sore need, in His name for whose sake they are suffering."

Mrs. E. K., Maitland, Mo., sends this prayer with her gift: "I pray that God will help feed the starving ones, and that peace and justice may soon dwell again among the nations."

"I send a gift for the relief of those Christians in Persia that are being persecuted for their religion," writes Miss H. P., Epping, N. H. "My desire is to help those who believe in Christ, and who are suffering such tortures for his sake. May the dear Lord spare them, and may he stop the war before we get into it."

"In response to your appeal for the starving ones of Persia, Syria and Armenia," writes A. T., Elmer, N. J., "I am forwarding the enclosed. May the Lord help them by hastening the end of all this needless slaughter."

"Seeing the report in a recent issue, writes G. W. P., Keene, N. H., "concerning the persecuted Persian Christians, and the statement that you had wired $10,000 for their relief, I am led to send the enclosed to help. The Word says, 'Do good to all men, especially unto them that are of the household of faith.' Let us help everybody we can, but our brethren in the family of Christ, first."

Another gift for the persecuted Persian Christians comes from "A Friend," in Donnellson, Iowa, who says: "May the Lord touch the hearts of men with means to help. My prayer is that in his mercy he may send us peace all over the world."

"My heart goes out in sympathy to those persecuted Christians," writes Miss A. S., Pickens, Miss., who also adds a gift; "and it goes out to all the widows and children who are suffering from this war, either through hunger or other causes, and of whatever nation or country. I would be glad if I could multiply my gift a hundred times."

Mrs. V. G. McF., Wenatchee, Wash., sends a check in behalf of the Persian Christian sufferers, and writes: "I wish it were possible to make my gift a thousand, instead of what it is. May God have mercy on the poor persecuted followers of Jesus everywhere."

"I am always glad to see that the Christian Herald is first and foremost in every good cause, both in a spiritual and material way. I am a poor man, and an invalid, but I enclose my mite for the sufferers in Armenia, and I wish it might be increased a hundred-fold." This from a "Friend" in Grasmere, N. H.

F. H. McI., Carlton, Wash., in sending his contribution, writes: "I wish this check were larger, but it may be that, by sending this, the Lord will open the way so that I can send more. I am away back up in the hills of Washington State, where the Christian Herald finds me every week. May God bless it and all its work."

The Swedish Baptist Sunday school of Gary, Neb., through V. Anderson, sends $25 to be applied among the sufferers where most needed. These are only a few among the large number of letters received, in all of which the writers are grateful for the opportunity to be of service.

In view of the pressing need, the Christian Herald, on March 19, cabled an additional remittance of $20,000, through the American Committee in New York, to be applied to relief work in Armenia, Syria, Persia and Palestine. On the same day the sum of $1,097.11 was forwarded for relief in Albania. The need in Syria and throughout the whole of Armenia, western Persia and a large part of Palestine, is very urgent. While relief work is temporarily impeded in Belgium and Poland, owing to war conditions, it is fortunately still open in the Near East, and we trust that all of our readers who desire to help the unfortunate people in these countries will take advantage of the opportunity now and send in their contributions.

Please address your gifts to the Christian Herald, Room 93, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State any preference you may have as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

SIXES

A 40-Year Car

Several Mitchells, built by Mr. Bate, have run over 200,000 miles. That's about 40 years of ordinary service.

But now Mr. Bate has doubled most of his margins of safety. Every vital part has 100 per cent over-strength. So any Mitchell, with ordinary care, should render lifetime service.

Over 440 parts are built of toughened steel. All safety parts are vastly oversize. Many parts are built of Chrome-Vanadium.

Gears are tested for 50,000 pounds per tooth. Engines must run, under heavy load, for 10,000 miles without wear. In two years not a single rear spring has broken.

No Extra Cost to You

All this added strength means no extra cost to you. All the Mitchell extras are free. Yet they include

31 unique features
24% added luxury
100% over-strength.

There are 31 features—like a power tire pump—which nearly all cars omit. There is beauty and luxury such as you see in no other car in this class.

This year we added 24 per cent to the cost of finish, upholstery and trimming. But the savings made in our new body plant pay it all.

The New $1150 Model

This year we build two sizes — Mitchell and Mitchell Junior. Even the smaller Six is roomy and powerful. You never saw such a car at this price.

All these marvelous values are due to John W. Bate, the famous efficiency expert. He built and equipped this mammoth plant to build this one type economically. His methods will save us, on this year's output, at least $4,000,000. That saving pays for all these extras. No other fine car offers anywhere near such value.

Go prove these facts, in justice to yourself. They are bound to win you to this Bate-built car.

PICTURE-STORIE

A Fascinating Method of Bibl
the Story of Biblical

ARE you acquainted with the charm of the Christian Herald plan for Bible study through the medium of pictures? Do you realize that the Bible Picture Study is an inspiring picture series, a home competition, an illuminator of the Holy Bible—all in one?

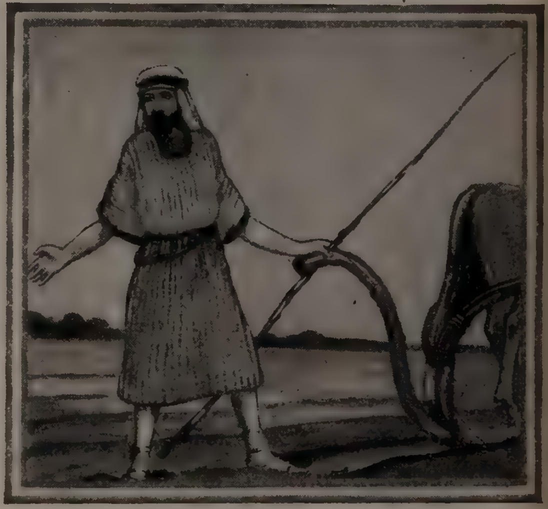
Picture No. 35



A Home Excursion Into Bible-Land

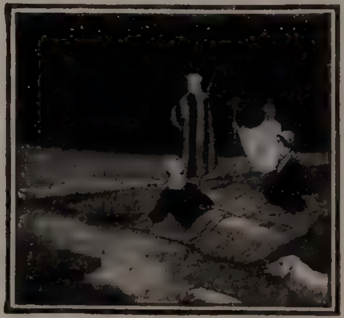
How wonderful it is to be a pilgrim in the Holy Land—to tread the paths that still remember the Saviour's feet, and to look upon the mountains and streams that form the land of the ancient Jews!

Not many of us, however, can make that long and costly journey. We can, at best, go there only in imagination. And yet this can be made real and vivid if aided by illustrations which call to mind the appearance of the land, the customs of the people, and invest all with the background of Bible happenings and Bible truths that make Palestine a Holy Land to millions of people.

And if these pictures be fitted to Bible verses, so that they be made to tell the story of Bible times, then we can say indeed that we have taken a home journey into Bible-Land.

Look at the six illustrations above. They are six of the Bible Picture Study pictures. Could you not, from the short list of Bible verses offered you in "Pearls from the Bible," choose verses to express or describe what the pictures show? That is all participants are called upon to do in our absorbing Second Bible Picture Study! The simple rules, free on request, outline the expenseless way of participating in the Study. Enter without delay!

How a Picture Tells a Story



Above is a specimen picture—one of those that appeared in the First Bible Picture Study, which ended some time ago. Participants searched through the list of verses for one that would fit this picture best, and the best verse for it, as officially decided, was as follows:

And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. Luke 2 : 8.

Doesn't that fit the scene well? It tells in words what the picture tells in illustration; and the combination of words and picture impresses the thought and beauty of the verse upon your mind.

The object of a participant in the Bible Picture Study is to fit the best verses to the pictures. Those who submit the best verses for the pictures will be awarded the $5,628.00 in cash rewards displayed to the right.

Bible Stories Told in Pictures

Have you brought the beautiful story of the Bible home to your children?

What an enthralling way, what a sure method, is this! Children love pictures—and this is true of young men and young women, too. You yourself, no matter how old you are, cannot resist the appeal of pictures; a picture tells a story so fully and convincingly that it is stamped on your mind. Can you know too much of the Bible, though you study it from youth to old age? It is an exhaustless source of strength. Why not learn about it from this new and fascinating viewpoint?

S OF THE BIBLE

Study, in Which Pictures Tell
ppenings and Truths

A SERIES of interesting pictures of Bible scenes or Bible Truths. A series of helpful verses, carefully chosen from the Bible. The story of the pictures is told by selecting the verses that fit the pictures best. This is called the Bible Picture Study.

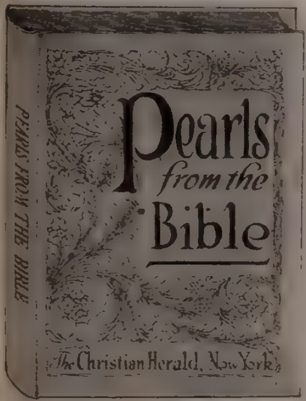
How to Secure the Second Bible Picture Study Equipment

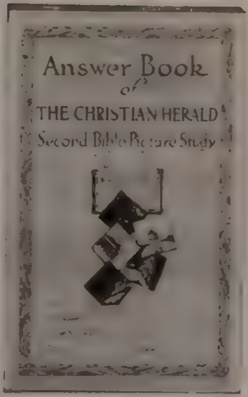


"Pearls from the Bible"

We have compiled a handy little volume of Bible verses, which we call "Pearls from the Bible," and this is the selection of verses from which you will choose those you believe fit the pictures. The Bible itself contains 31,101 verses, but here are gathered only 2,000—a small but noteworthy collection. You will treasure this volume as a part of your home library, after the Second Bible Picture Study has ended. Couldn't you find, in "Pearls from the Bible," a verse to fit each of the six pictures shown along the double page above? Wouldn't you enjoy doing that, and wouldn't you learn much of the Bible, in the pleasantest way?

The Handy Answer Book

In submitting the verses you believe best describe or fit what the pictures show, you can enjoy the convenience of our Answer Book, in which there is space to write down the verses for each picture. Then send in the Answer Book to us—and you may gain first reward!



All the Pictures

All of the sixty pictures appear in the Christian Herald, several each week, and if you start now you will be sent all the pictures which have appeared up to the time we enter your order. Then you will clip the balance of the series from the Christian Herald week by week.

Traveling Companions and Eternal Youth

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

HE was seventy-five years old, but he didn't look it. True, his hair was white, and his mild eyes peered out at one from behind the thickness of powerful glasses, and his step wasn't—hurried. But his laugh was the laugh of a schoolboy, and his point of view was as fresh and vivid as a young man's, and his ambition as vast and limitless.

"The Fountain of Youth was the greatest joke in history," he chuckled. "Poor Ponce de Leon! When he sailed off to find it he found a new land instead. If he had only realized that it isn't necessary to cross seas to find eternal youth! He should have searched in his own heart."

We were sitting out in his garden—the garden that has been growing luxuriantly for some forty years. Overhead a robin thrilled suddenly, and I looked up to catch a glimpse of it through a soft mass of pink apple-blossoms. The old man followed my glance, and we were both silent a moment, caught by the fragrant beauty above us.

"I know what you're thinking," he said at last. "I know you're thinking that it's easy enough to feel young on a day in the springtime when the birds are singing and the apple-blossoms are—blooming! Isn't that what you're thinking?"

"It is," I assented, following with my eyes the spot of red that the robin's breast made. "It is just what I'm thinking. But there are other days—other seasons——"

"Yes, other days," intercepted the old man; "scorching summer days, and drab autumn days, and freezing winter days, when it isn't so easy to keep the spirit of eternal youth in the heart. I know! But always, in the springtime, I fill my soul so full of love and the joy of life and—yes, youth—that it lasts through the whole year!"

"Yes," I answered, "you do! But some people—don't."

"That's," said the old man, and his face looked as young—almost as young—as the apple-blossoms, "that's because some people don't look at life in the right way. And I can't help thinking that I do look at life in the right way." He paused for a moment, and then went on.

"Life," he said to me, "is a road that I must journey along. But I don't have to travel alone—no, indeed! I can choose my traveling companions, and they can be Love and Hope and Trust, and Faith and Laughter. And if I walk with them smilingly, they'll go with me to the end of the road. Some people make a mistake in choosing the companions they travel with—for a traveling companion must be chosen with great care. A traveling companion must be one who can share pleasant, as well as stormy, weather—who can tolerate the delays and anxieties of a rough trip. Some people choose companions that are unpleasant—Distrust, and Intolerance, and Greed, and Bitterness. And so, almost before they start on the road, the Eternal Youth dies out of their hearts."

The old man paused, and as he paused I couldn't help remembering a journey that I had once made by train into the country. It was a long and dusty trip, and I was not alone, for a girl who had been a casual friend of mine for years was with me.

I remembered how we relaxed wearily into our seats as the train pulled out of the station. And then I remembered the rest of the journey as one remembers a bad dream. First the car was too hot and my companion opened the windows. And then, as the dust and soft coal smoke blew in through the opening, she nervously jerked them shut again. She was thirsty, and the drinking-cup looked unsanitary, so she fussed until the conductor brought paper ones. And then her paper cup leaked. And then the windows were jerked open again and then pulled down. I shall never forget that trip.

And I remembered a trip—a longer, warmer, dustier trip—that I had taken with another friend of mine. I remembered how she ignored the heat, how she helped amuse a stranger's baby, and how she smiled at me until the weariness faded from my eyes. I remembered how the colored porter and the white conductor vied with each other in opening windows for her, and bringing drinking-cups and foot-rests. I remembered how her laugh had cheered me, and how her interest in the passing scenery had stirred my interest.

LIFE'S road may be what you and your traveling companions make it. Life may be a dusty journey uphill with nothing at the top but the stark skeleton of a tree silhouetted against the saffron of the sky. Or life may be a pleasant venture, taken laughingly into unknown countries and over uncharted seas—a venture full of romance and joy and mirth.

The old man was seventy-five years old—but he didn't look it, sitting there in his garden listening to the song of an early robin. He looked young, and his venerable head seemed prematurely white. Old age had come to him gently and gracefully because he was able to keep the fragrant vision of spring ever before his eyes—because he was able to keep a song in his heart of hearts, and the light of happiness in his soul.

Oh, friends of mine, now that the springtime is here, drink in the beauty of the fragrant blossoms, and the music of the bird-songs, and the joy of awakening nature! Fill your mind with pictures of the world at its youngest, freshest, sweetest time, so that when other duller days come you will still have love and youth and the joy of life in your hearts.

For though the springtime may only last for a little while—a few too short months—the memory of it may last forever. And that memory, if it's kept fragrant, may give the happiness of eternal youth to you!

Daffodils

YOUTH and Love and the Joy of Life,
They walk with me, these three—
And I somehow know that they will go
To the journey's end with me.
So I will sing along the road,
And wake the hills with laughter;
For if they stay to the journey's end,
I fear not what comes after!

Ah, what if Youth grows dim and frail?
For Joy of Life will stay me;
And Love will bide close at my side,
That nothing can dismay me.
And Youth, though frail and dim to see,
Will be alive and glowing
Against my soul, to keep it sweet
With winds of April blowing!

Youth and Love and the Joy of Life,
They walk with me, these three!
And I know that they will make the way
A sunfilled path for me.
And so I gather daffodils,
And trouble shall not stay me;
And Death itself, at the journey's end,
Will smile and not dismay me!

A MOVEMENT was started in Chicago on December 6 last to find employment for men between 45 and 65. The Committee on Unemployment, composed of business men, placed an advertisement in an evening newspaper, in response to which up to the present time they have received 3,000 applications for employment from men who had passed the age limit. Various business associations cooperated with the committee in finding jobs for these old men, with the result that 800 of them were immediately set to work with $1 a day as the lowest wage and $125 a month as the highest salary. Over 200 trades and professions were represented among the applicants. There was practically no illiteracy among them, but there was a liberal sprinkling of college and university graduates. It is estimated that the average applicant has ten years' working life ahead of him.

Why Brush Teeth

If It Doesn't Save Them?

By Wm. M. Ruthrauff, A. B., A. M.

All Tooth Troubles Come From Film

Your Methods Do Not End It

There is a film—a slimy film—which gathers on your teeth. It is there now—you can feel it with your tongue. It lodges in crevices, and stays.

That film is the source of all tooth troubles. It is that film—not the enamel—which discolors. It hardens into tartar. Food particles cling to it, ferment and form acid—the cause of all tooth decay. The germs of pyorrhea—which inflame the gums and loosen the teeth—breed in it.

Common methods of brushing don't remove that film. Many a dentifrice helps it to harden.

That's why teeth discolor. That's why tartar forms, and why decay begins. That's why you must frequently visit a dentist, to have your teeth scoured. And that's why millions suffer from pyorrhea.

You remove the debris, but not the film. Not the dangerous part at least.

Such brushing is almost useless. It seems to clean, but it doesn't. You know that. Your teeth don't long stay white, or free from tartar. And you don't prevent decay.

Your real teeth-cleaning is done periodically—done in a dentist's chair. Done by vigorous methods which remove the film. It is done too rarely—often too late.

Why continue such inefficient methods? Why seem to do what you don't do? Teeth with film are not clean, not safe.

There is now a way to keep teeth free from film. With the same brush you now use, but a new-day dentifrice. It is dainty and pleasing. And it does what must be done.

You will use it when you prove it. It will bring you new protection, new delights. This is to urge that you prove that new method—Pepsodent—by a one-week trial—free.

Try This New Way One Week Free

It Convinces 20,000 Weekly

About 20,000 people weekly now accept this offer. That means a million a year. They are learning the way to filmless teeth. And we urge you to also find it.

A new invention—Pepsodent—solves the problem of that film. That is proved by three years of countless clinical tests, made by high dental authorities. And five governments, by granting patents, have conceded its unique efficiency.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. It digests at least 20 times its weight of hard-boiled white of egg. The film on teeth has about the same constituents.

The object of Pepsodent is to digest the film so that brushing can remove it.

Its uniqueness lies in the activating agent. Pepsin alone is inert. The old activating agent—acid—is harmful to the teeth. The agent in Pepsodent is not.

This invention has made the use of pepsin possible in a daily attack on that film.

Pepsodent is dainty. It doesn't taste medicinal. Its polishing agent is calcium phosphate, of which teeth are largely composed. So in every way it is ideal.

For your own sake make a one-week test. We will supply the tube. See how it combats that film. Note how the teeth whiten, and how clean they feel.

That week will convince you. Going back to old methods will then be unthinkable. As long as you live you will want the delight of having teeth really clean.

Ask for this One-Week Tube. Cut out this coupon so you won't forget. It will mean to you more than you know.

Jesus Anointed at Bethany

International Sunday School Lesson for April 22
John 12 : 1-11

The Fragrance of Friendship

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

IN the twelfth chapter we come to the crest of the Fourth Gospel: the highwater mark of love and recognition in the tribute of Mary and the triumphal entry, and the crystalizing of the envy and hatred that led to crucifying the Lord of Glory. Here too is a foregleam of the world evangel in the coming of the Greeks to seek Jesus (verses 20–24).

It is the beginning of Christ's last week. He is determined to go to Jerusalem to the Passover. All knew the danger from the plotting priests. Jesus, weary of body from his journey, and weary of mind from the nagging unfairness of his opponents, found a refuge in the little suburb of Bethany, where he had some of his most devoted friends.

As a testimony of appreciation they made a little feast in his honor. How we would welcome the opportunity to do the same! Make very real to your boys and girls this hospitable gathering and Mary's wish to do something especially helpful and comforting for her Lord. She remembered the box of precious ointment. Perhaps she had long treasured it and felt that it was too good to be used! At last she had a chance, for here was One worthy of the best.

Public anointing was a sign of great honor. It was a tribute to kings and prophets. To Mary Jesus was supremely worthy of it. The fragrance of the ointment filled the house. As you know, "Messiah" and "Christ" mean simply "the anointed one." Now at last Jesus of Nazareth was publicly anointed, not by priests or kings in pomp and ceremony, but by a loving woman in the house of his friend, a reclaimed leper! What a parable it all is!

The Refuge of Friendship

Friends are the joy of life. Jesus was a Master of Friendship. His friendships were cemented with acts of service in times of need. Simon the Leper was now his host. We can imagine what Jesus had done for him—freed him from a loathsome disease and made him once more a member of society. Now his house is Jesus' refuge in stormy times.

Helping Simon were the sisters whose brother Jesus had restored. How natural they are: Martha, as usual, busy with the cooking and the service; Lazarus, silent and reserved, but beloved of the Lord nevertheless; Mary, thoughtful, spiritual, gracious! We know people of these various types. They all make devoted Christian friends.

The Comforts of Friendship

"Oh, the comfort, the inexpressible comfort of feeling safe with a person—having neither to weigh thought nor measure words, but pouring them all right out just as they are, chaff and grain together, certain that a faithful hand will take and sift them, keep what is worth keeping and with the breath of comfort blow the rest away!"

Even Jesus needed that comfort, that converse with sympathetic people who were not trying to "ensnare him in his talk." When storm-clouds gather true friends are a refuge indeed.

Miss Grace Dodge, friend of the friendless in New York City, passed on to all of us a street-boy's great definition of a friend "A friend is some one who knows all about you but loves you just the same." Such a friend is Jesus Christ to us. Such friends we ought to be to one another.

Showing Our Affection

Two people were very happy because of Mary's impulsive act. her joy in giving was even greater than his in receiving. We are so fearfully undemonstrative, so afraid of showing affection, of "wearing our hearts on our sleeves." We hold back the words of cordial brotherhood even in church. We are tongue-tied when we talk to the downhearted. Men and women are starving for appreciation and comradeship right in the church itself.

Speak to your boys and girls about being affectionately appreciative at home. Are they taking love and care and daily provision for body and mind in an ungrateful way? Many a mother would be almost overwhelmed if her boys would show affection. Perhaps the highest Christian service your youngsters could render today would be to fling themselves into mother's arms with joyous appreciation.

We are beginning a crusade against keeping our flowers for funerals. A bouquet would surprise some folks as much as the alabaster box stirred up the little company at Bethany.

False Economy

Some people begrudge the expenditure of money to beautify the home or to bring the comforting message of friendship in time of trouble. To them flowers are of no use, pictures and music a waste of money. But a life restricted to things that go into the pot or are worn on the back results in starving the spirit. "If I had two loaves of bread I would sell one of them and buy white hyacinths to feed my soul." That was the terse and poetic statement of a truth oft neglected.

Even the poor need other things more than they need money. The money will be gone next month, but the memory of a great bunch of wild flowers remains. "Flower missions" furnish a beautiful ministry that almost any Sunday school class can exercise. Send your posies to the hospitals or to the children of the slums.

Poor disciples, murmuring "Waste, waste!" For whom could the spikenard have been more nobly used? Did they want it sold to gratify some soft, luxurious nobleman? There are lovely things all around us that should be used in lovely ways to minister to Jesus Christ and to the least of his brethren.

What were three hundred pence compared with the joy of Jesus in the midst of the darkening close of his life? Jesus said that wherever the Gospel is preached what this woman did shall be told. And the perfume has been wafted down the ages and to the uttermost parts of the earth. Mary's broken box has taught millions the sweetness of pouring out one's best, and the value in God's sight of gifts that cannot be weighed or measured here below.

The Ministry of the Beautiful

Jesus' approval, "She hath wrought a good work," stands forever as a justification of art and poetry and song. These are the intangible things that have to do with souls. To miss the communion with the artist and the inspired poet is to have lost something from the higher reaches of existence. See to it that your Sunday school boys and girls know the pictures of Hoffman for example, which are exquisitely beautiful portrayals of the scenes in Christ's life and at the same time are easily within the comprehension of the youngest. And fine reproductions can be secured for so little. The Boy Jesus in the Temple, Christ and the Rich Young Ruler, Christ in Gethsemane, form a series rich in meaning.

Protestant churches have often been lacking in the ministry of beauty. There is no reason why the walls of our Bible schools should be bare when a few dollars would make them speak the messages of the Sistine Madonna, Watts's Sir Galahad, and that good American picture, the Puritans Going to Church. Public school-rooms are seldom without secular pictures, and the church school should do as much for the great religious paintings.

Jesus loved to look at the gorgeous red of the sunset. He stopped enraptured to consider the lilies of the field. It would be a service like Mary's for your class to provide a wealth of spring flowers for the church some Sunday in the near future. Jesus would be pleased. People whom Jesus loves would be helped thereby.

God is the Creator of all beauty. He hath made everything beautiful in its time. A conch-shell is a sermon in itself, and an orchard in full bloom is a convincing argument for the existence of God.

"Always"—"Not Always"

There are acts of service that we can render at almost any time. There are others that come but once and for a moment. Mary's devotion was so timely. Just when Jesus needed something of the kind. Just as he was steeling himself for the nails of the cross. Just when he might wonder if he should all too soon be forgotten by those for whom he had done so much.

"The poor ye have always with you, and whensoever ye will ye can do them good." As Christians we must be constant in responding to the calls of charity, of missions, of war-relief in these sorrowful days. "But me ye have not always." Right now Jesus of Nazareth may be passing by in the person of some one he loves who is lonely and needs friendship, sick and should be visited, a stranger and should be taken into the fellowship of the people of God.

Boys and girls need to be told that fathers and mothers will not be with them always. John B. Gough said he would give his right arm to forget how he had treated his mother. Dr. Samuel Johnson stood out in the rain at the place where he had disobeyed his dead father. As I go about and try to minister to those who have been bereaved of loved ones I hear again and again, "If I only had them back how differently I would do, how I should show that I loved them."

Not always do we have the choice privileges of friendship.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

What to Do on Temperance Sunday

A LIVE young business man is at the head of the Oakland Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, Chicago. He says: "My temperance ambition is that all the boys and girls who pass through our Sunday school may get such an impression of the liquor business that they will fear to be enrolled in its ranks—that they will help to bring about prohibition for Chicago and the United States."

And this is the way he goes about it: He plans for Temperance Sunday weeks in advance. When the day comes he illustrates with objects, pictures and experiments. The latter show from a scientific standpoint the effects of alcohol upon the different organs of the body, using parts of an animal for this purpose. This is followed by pledge-signing, the scholars taking the pledge home, and the duplicate is strung on ribbons with others for wall decoration on Temperance Day.

The school keeps an honor roll of several hundred names as a permanent temperance record. Publicity literature is obtained from headquarters of the Anti-Saloon League, Anti-Cigarette and Prohibition organizations and distributed, and speakers come to tell their story of progress in the temperance movement.

Back of the temperance sentiment of this school is a Temperance Band, including children from the Primary to the Intermediate age. Faithfulness in attendance at the Sunday Band meetings was rewarded by invitation to a Temperance banquet at the close of the season. The Band was divided into classes of not over seven members each. These were supervised by picked helpers. The hour included bright music, a twenty-five-minute temperance lesson, ten minutes of handwork on the lesson taught. Forty-seven completed their hand books with attractive covers. An artistic young man drew enlarged temperance pictures for illustration. Sometimes bottles were dressed and told their story. A Bible verse was committed to memory for each lesson.

The twelve classes in the Junior Department had each a temperance name and banner with a Bible verse to suit, and on Temperance Sunday they answered the roll-call with their names and verses and one for the whole school. The following are the salutes to flags and banners:

Our flag: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the Republic for which it stands! one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."
Conquest flag: "To the flag that represents the world for Christ, I pledge my love, my loyalty, my life."
W. C. T. U. banner: "For God and Home and Native Land I pledge my word, my prayer, my helping hand."
Teetotaler's verse: Prov. 20 : 1.
Loyal Temperance League: Prov. 23 : 31–32.
Young Crusaders: Hab. 2 : 12.
Touch Not Band: Col. 2 : 21.
Band of Hope: I Thess. 5 : 8.
Daniel's Band: Dan. 1 : 8.
Song: "Dare to Be a Daniel."
Temperance Heroes: Hab. 2 : 15.
Knights of the Golden Rule: Lev. 19 : 18.
King's Daughters: Ps. 144 : 12.
Armor-Bearers: Eph. 6 : 11.
Frances Willard Band: Rev. 22 : 17.
Purity Band: Matt. 5 : 8.
All recite: Ps. 20 : 5.

Alcohol and cigarette lessons are usually alternated in the band's service. Then there are temperance and cigarette yells and songs, which are enjoyed, and which are used in the band's outings. Here is one yell:

"Ding dong bell!
Near the death knell.
The boys and girls now tell!
Ring it long and well!
The saloon must go forever –
In Illinois!"

The effect of all this is that Temperance Day is anticipated and enjoyed, and the boys and girls are being inoculated thoroughly with the temperance germ. One boy carried home the lesson, the effects of alcohol upon the brain, and repeated it in full at the dinner table, adding, "Daddy, that is the picture of your brain." Both father and mother were weeping and the father promised his boy that he could not say that of him truly again. He became a reformed man.

Low Finance in Mexico

AT Vera Cruz, Mexico, a missionary of the Presbyterian Board in the United States, who went to his field for the first time, had his first experience also with the finances of the country. He says: "After being duly inspected by the medical authorities, we found hotel rooms and sallied forth in search of supper. Before entering a restaurant we changed some money, and I wish you could have seen the rolls of paper money we had. We had a good supper, but paid twenty-one dollars a plate for it! After that a fellow traveler took my four companions and myself to a coffee-house and spent $47.25. As I sat there I had my shoes blackened, for which I paid $3. But then we were using cheap money, so it was not so bad. I felt rich when I had changed a good five-dollar bill, with Uncle Sam's seal on it, for $350 paper bearing Mr. Carranza's seal. I had my pockets literally stuffed. This paper money had little if anything back of it, and consequently was deteriorating in value. Two weeks later it was selling 120 for 1, and by about the first of December there was none of it in sight at all, except what the government used in paying its employees. At present silver and gold are in circulation, but they are both scarce. When people get hold of it they don't like to let it out of their hands, for they don't know when it will come back."

Stop and get it, and it means the end of any corn.

Pass it by, and the corn will stay. You know that from experience.

Blue-jay does more than end a corn. It proves that corns are needless.

Apply it, and the corn pain stops. Leave it on two days, and the whole corn disappears. Only extra stubborn corns need an extra application.

Prove that once, and corn troubles end forever. You will never again permit them.

To millions of people—users of Blue-jay—corns are a pest of the past.

Do what they did—try it. See what a Blue-jay does. Learn why so many millions are now used each year.

Lay aside the old-time methods. Use this modern way tonight. You will wish that you had started years ago.

Questions and Answers

WILL any reader of the Christian Herald favor us with the name of the author of the poem quoted below, together with a copy of the additional verses, if possible? The Christian Herald will be glad to return the favor by sending a book to the first who replies.

"In the crimson blush of morning,
In the glitter of the noon,
In the midnight's gloomy darkness,
In the shimmer of the moon;
In the stillness of the twilight,
As it shimmers in the sky,
We are watching, we are waiting
For the end that draweth nigh. '

J. M. B. Y., Waxahachie, Texas. Please explain Daniel third chapter.

In Dan. 1 : 6 the companions of Daniel are spoken of as the children of Judah. This means of the tribe of Judah. There is no evidence that they were brothers in the sense of blood relationship. Shadrach was the Chaldee name of Hananiah, the chief of the "three children," or young men of the tribe of Judah, who were Daniel's companions. He was taken captive with Daniel and a number of others at the first invasion of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar, about B.C. 606. All four were young men of kingly bearing, of the royal tribe of Judah, and of superior understanding or education. Meshach was the Chaldee name given by the Babylonian court to Mishael, and Abednego was the name similarly bestowed on Azariah. With regard to the fourth man seen by Nebuchadnezzar, the king was unconsciously—like Saul, Caiaphas and Pilate—made to utter truths the full import of which he did not himself understand. The One he saw was, to him, an angel. He could not of course know the true significance of the vision. There is no present intention of publishing the articles you mention in book form.

E. R. Carswell, Indiana, writes: "I know that both you and your questioner would be glad of a more definite answer to the question in a recent issue as to whether 'the present European War may not be one of the vials of wrath of Revelation 16.' Answer: Not possibly; for all of Revelation after the third chapter dates beyond the Second Coming of Christ. See Rev. 1 : 19 for the grand divisions of the book as given by our Lord himself. The first division is chapter 1, the vision of the permanent transfiguration personal of Jesus as Priest and Judgment-King. Second division, chapters 2 and 3, the historic-prophetic application of the seven church periods. This will take us to the coming of Christ in the air, as a thief in the night, to steal away his church body and bride from the earth. From other Scriptures (as Dan. 9) we know seven years of supreme anarchy will measure from this date to Christ's return with his saints, to make settlement with Israel and the nations, and to inaugurate his Millennial Kingdom. Chapters 4 and 5 describe what is to take place in heaven; and chapters 6 to 19, what will take place on earth during the seven years. And the third division of Revelation covers all of the ground of these seven years. Now, the Great Tribulation will cover the last half of the seven years—three and a half years—and the seven vials of God's wrath will furnish the climax of the most fearful period of all time. General predictions, such as "wars and rumors of wars," and "nations shall rise up against nations," are filling up their undefined measure now. No definite prophetic event blocks the way to the coming of our King. Matt. 24 and Revelation, by its own analysis of itself, fix the chronology of telic events.

Interested Reader, New York. As the Christian Herald has direct relations with the missionaries in the field, and knows how faithfully and wisely funds entrusted to their care are applied, we can only say that such a statement as you mention is untrue, unjust and unfounded. There are people who talk without knowledge, and you may be sure that any one making such a statement belongs to this class. As far as the missionary societies are concerned, they can speak for themselves. We have confidence in their absolute integrity and their wise and faithful administration of the funds committed to them for missionary purposes.

Friend, Oregon. Your kind letter is one of many that have come to us expressing warm approval of the story of John Goode, and also the hope that he may be sent out as a Gospel messenger to win others from sin. This hope has already been realized, and Mr. Goode, is now addressing audiences in different churches and halls in the Eastern States, where his life-story is holding them as few speakers have ever been able to do. Some of these days he may even be able to go out among the men in the mining and lumber camps. We have sent him your letter and you may hear from him.

W. M. M., Ohio. The names of Paul's parents are not given in the Scriptures. The only mention of his blood relations is in Acts 23 : 16 and Rom. 16 : 7, 11, but whether these were really relatives or simply friends is an open question.

If the writer of the letter signed "A True Friend, Forest, Ohio," will send his name and address to the Christian Herald, he will receive an answer to his recent communication.

Mr. W. A. Hillis, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, writes that the beautiful little poem, "Remembrance," which appeared in the issue of March 14, has a singular history. Diligent search has failed to discover its authorship. For years Mr. Hillis has used it in his letters and in other ways, and it has gone largely among the soldiers and sailors. He writes: "There is a message for many a tired, weary heart in it, and it has been found a great help to some who had drifted away."

Reader, Newark, Ill. If all Christians were filled with the Spirit, would they receive the power to preach and exhort, regardless of temperament and natural talent?

The testimony of the Scriptures is against this proposition. By reading I Cor. 12 : 8 and Eph. 4 : 11, you will see that the Spirit, working in us, gives to different ones diverse spiritual gifts for different uses. Some receive the gift of preaching, others are fitted for interpretation; others, again, have wisdom in counsel, and still others have different gifts or endowments; to each being given that power for which he is best fitted.

H. M. T., Argyle, N. Y. When Jesus was tempted by the devil, as told in Matt. 4, was he taken to the pinnacle of the temple and to a high mountain?

There are several views of the temptation. Some interpret it literally—holding that there was a real external experience with Satan and an actual ascending of the pinnacle of the temple and a high mountain, probably the Mount of Olives, Mount Nebo or Mount Tabor. Others regard it as a soul experience and struggle with Satan, in which Jesus was merely led into the temptation in spirit, or that it may indicate a vision such as occurred to Peter (Acts 10) and to Paul (II Cor. 12). In any event, the spiritual meaning of the account is important. Jesus came on earth to bear our infirmities, and in order to do so he had to have our earthly experiences, many of the most exasperating of which are our constant temptations. By being tempted, he became as one of us, and by overcoming the wiles of Satan he has conquered him—so why should we fear one who is conquered? (See Heb. 4 : 15).

C. H. E., Elizabethville, Pa. The Old Testament books of Kings, Chronicles and Judges are largely records of war. They are, in the main, historical; indeed, a large part of the Old Testament is Jewish history. It is altogether different with the New Testament, however, which is the story of the Saviour's life and work on earth, and the doctrines and development of the early Christian Church.

Mrs. B., Rutherford, N. J. The "sign of the fish" was one of the signs by which the early Christians recognized each other. It consisted of the figure of a fish, or the letters of the Greek word for fish, ichthus (in Greek characters), which were the initials of the words "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour." They are found in epitaphs on tombs in the catacombs in Rome, often in connection with the figure of a fish.

Miss Ella Hettick, 116A Palisades Avenue, Jersey City, would be grateful to any one who could send her the present address of her only brother, whom she has not seen or heard from in seven years.

Constant Reader, Huntington, W. Va. The system of frequent changes in the pastorate, which prevails in certain denominations, has its good as well as its bad points. It is certainly a lamentable thing to change a pastor who is making good spiritual progress in his community and to turn the flock over to a new man, who may undo much of the good he has accomplished. Such changes should be avoided, if possible. But all pastors are not alike as spiritual leaders. There are some who do not wear well in a long pastorate, and who are re-energized by being transferred to new fields. We have known of congregations that were saddled with a pastor whom they would gladly have got rid of, and with whom they found themselves unable to work harmoniously. It is the old story of a round peg in a square hole. Common sense should be applied in such changes.

There is no finer picture that lingers in the memory than that of a beloved pastor who has spent nearly all his years in active service in one field. He has officiated at the baptisms and marriages of a large majority of his members of the second generation. He has laid away many of the older ones in their last resting-place. He has been a true spiritual father to them all, and has won their love and esteem. But there comes a day when it is impressed upon him that he should go to another field. And only after he has gone do his people realize the value of the counselor and friend they have lost.

Dr. John Peach of Mitchellsville, Md., writes: "Please call a halt on my query in your issue of January 3. I have received replies from Canada to Florida and as far west as Wisconsin, sending me copies of the poem 'October's Party,' which I had asked for in the query. I am thankful to them all, and really I have enough October Parties to last me for a long time."

Rev. J. W. Meninger, Lancaster, Pa., writes calling in question the claim that the richest county—the most productive agricultural district in the United States—is in Maine. He declares "Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, has held the banner for years. Its agricultural products last year were worth over $19,000,000."

Sincerity, Fort Ann, N. Y. Your village church problem, as you have described it, is a difficult one. The community needs a deep spiritual arousal, and this probably could be attained by the earnest Christians getting together and securing the services of a good evangelist who would deal with the saloons, dances, card games and other evils that are so pronounced. If the churches won't unite in such a movement, then let the one church whose minister has the spiritual welfare of the community at heart take up the burden, and, with the personal help and generosity of those who are like-minded with yourself, great good may be accomplished. Write to Rev. Parley E. Zartmann, secretary of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, Winona Lake, Ind., stating the case, and he will advise you.

Reader, Dana, Ind. Your request has been sent to the Prayer League. You should join your own petition to their prayers that the cloud may be lifted, and that conviction of sin may strike deep into the hearts of those who have gone wrong, and whose acts are causing so much suffering and humiliation. Seek the counsel of some good Christian woman in your section, who will guide you in taking your troubles to the only Source of help. Never lose your faith in God. Ask him, for his dear Son's sake, to help you, and he will assuredly do it, for he is faithful that promised.

A reader in Sanford, Fla., writes: "Permit me to relate a little incident that evinces appreciation of our Christian Herald. We have a dear old gentleman, eighty-seven years of age, who is a subscriber. He is a man of piety and culture—a physician and a local preacher. The pretty and touching story that appeared in your columns, entitled 'Joyce Mayfield, Crusader,' by Alice Mary Kimball, so charmed him that he had a thousand copies of it struck off in leaflet form for distribution. They were presented to our W. C. T. U. for this purpose. Dr. B. felt that the story would be an inspiration. A fine elocutionist read it at our last meeting, and was so overcome with emotion that she had to exert self-control to continue the reading. On last Sunday evening copies were sent to our four leading congregations, in the hope that their perusal would stimulate attendance on the lecture on temperance, to be given here by ex-Governor Hanly of the Flying Squadron. Our legislature sits in April, and it is confidently expected that the amendment for state-wide prohibition will be submitted to the people."

E. L., Newburgh, N. Y., referring to a recent Mail-Bag paragraph, writes: "It was an interesting item as to the Lord's Prayer and many were helped by it. As an earnest Christian, I wish to say that I myself prefer to read the sentence punctuating thus: 'Lead us, not into temptation, but in the right way.'" Such a reading is of course unauthoritative, but probably conveys what was in the writer's mind, that he may be led in the path of righteousness and kept from straying into the ways of sin. It is the equivalent of saying, "Suffer us not to be led into temptation."

E. L. L., Allentown, Pa. There are many organizations of the class you mention, to which no objection can possibly be made. It must be a matter for the individual conscience. If you find in it what you believe in your heart to be wrong, or concerning which you have serious doubts, have no association with it.

H. G., New Haven, Conn. The statement of the New York Evangelistic Committee that out of a total population of 5,500,000 in the metropolis, 3,300,000 were without church affiliations, did not represent the latter as "heathen" in any sense, but simply as outside of church relationship. Nor did it draw the line at any nationality or race. As everybody knows, there are many outside the churches who cannot be called "heathen."

In the old days of her happy girlhood, Helen Barnet had taken as a matter of course the succumbing of everything and everybody to her charm and beauty. And although this feeling had, perforce, been in abeyance for some eighteen months, it had been very rapidly coming back to her during the past two weeks, under the devoted homage of her young husband and the admiring eyes of numberless strangers along their honeymoon way.

It was a complete and disagreeable surprise to her now, therefore, when Burke said to her, a trifle nervously, as they were nearing Dalton:

"We'll have to go to a hotel, of course, Helen, for a few days, till we get the apartment ready. But 't won't be for long, dear."

"Hotel! Apartment! Why, Burke, aren't we going home—to your home?"

"Oh, no, dear. We're going to have a home of our own, you know—our home."

"No, I didn't know." Helen's lips showed a decided pout.

"But you'll like it, dear. You just wait and see." The man spoke with determined cheeriness.

"But I can't like it better than your old home, Burke. I know what that is, and I'd much rather go there."

"Yes, yes, but——" Young Denby paused to wet his dry lips. "Er—you know, dear, dad wasn't exactly—er—pleased with the marriage, anyway, and——"

"That's just it," broke in the bride eagerly. "That's one reason I wanted to go there—to show him, you know. Why, Burke, I'd got it all planned out lovely, how nice I was going to be to him—get his paper and slippers, and kiss him good-morning, and——"

"Holy smoke! Kiss——" Just in time the fastidious son of a still more fastidious father pulled himself up; but to a more discerning bride, his face would already have finished his sentence. "Er—but—well, anyhow, dear," he stammered, "that's very kind of you, of course; but you see it's useless even to think of it. He—he has forbidden us to go there."

"Why, the mean old thing!"

"Helen!"

Helen's face showed a frown as well as a pout.

"I don't care. He is mean, if he is your father, not to let——"

"Helen!"

At the angry sharpness of the man's voice Helen stopped abruptly. For a moment she gazed at her husband with reproachful eyes. Then her chin began to quiver, her breath to come in choking little gasps, and the big tears to roll down her face.

"Why, Burke, I——"

"Oh, great Scott! Helen, dearest, don't, please!" begged the dismayed and distracted young husband, promptly capitulating at the awful sight of tears of which he was the despicable cause. "Darling, don't!"

"But you never sp-spoke like that to me b-before," choked the wife of a fortnight.

"I know. I was a brute—so I was! But, sweetheart, please stop," he pleaded desperately. "See, we're just pulling into Dalton. You don't want them to see you crying—a bride!"

Mrs. Burke Denby drew in her breath convulsively, and lifted a hurried hand to brush the tears from her eyes. The next moment she smiled, tremulously, but adorably. She looked very lovely as she stepped from the car a little later; and Burke Denby's heart swelled with love and pride as he watched her. If underneath the love and pride there was a vague something not so pleasant, the man told himself it was only a natural regret at having said anything to cast the slightest shadow on the home-coming of this dear girl whom he had asked to share his life. Whatever this vague something was, anyway, Burke resolutely put it behind him, and devoted himself all the more ardently to the comfort of his young wife.

In spite of himself, Burke could not help looking for his father's face at the station. Never before had he come home (when not with his father), and not been welcomed by that father's eager smile and outstretched hand. He missed them both now. Otherwise he was relieved to see few people he knew, as he stepped to the platform, though he fully realized, from the sly winks and covert glances, that every one knew who he was, and who also was the lady at his side.

With only an occasional perfunctory greeting, and no introductions, therefore, the somewhat embarrassed and irritated bridegroom hurried his bride into a public carriage, and gave the order to drive to the Hancock Hotel.

All the way there he talked very fast and very tenderly of the new home that was soon to be theirs.

"'T will be only for a little—the hotel, dear," he plunged in at once. "And you won't mind it, for a little, while we're planning, will you, darling? I'm going to rent one of the Reddington apartments. You remember them—on Reddington Avenue; white stone with dandy little balconies between the big bay windows. They were just being finished when you were here. They're brand-new, you see. And we'll be so happy there, dearie,—just us two!"

"Us two! But, Burke, there'll be three. There'll have to be the hired girl, too, you know," fluttered the new wife, in quick panic. "Surely you aren't going to make me do without a hired girl!"

"Oh, no—no, indeed," asserted the man, all the more hurriedly, because he never had thought of a "hired girl," and because he was rather fearfully wondering how much his father paid for the maids, anyway. There would have to be one, of course; but he wondered if his allowance would cover it, with all the rest. Still, he could smoke a cigar or two less a day, he supposed, if it came to a pinch, and—but Helen was speaking.

"Dear, dear, but you did give me a turn, Burke! You see, there'll just have to be a hired girl—that is, if you want anything to eat, sir," she laughed, showing all her dimples. (And Burke loved her dimples!) "I can't cook a little bit. I never did at home, you know, and I should hate it, I'm sure. It's so messy—sticky dough and dishes, and all that!" Again she laughed and showed all her dimples, looking so altogether bewitching that Burke almost—but not quite—stole a kiss. He decided, too, on the spot, that he would rather never smoke another cigar than to subject this adorable little thing at his side to any task that had to do with the hated "messy dough and sticky dishes." Indeed he would!

Something of this must have shown in his face, for the little bride beamed anew, and the remainder of the drive was a blissfully happy duet of fascinating plans regarding this new little nest of a home.

All this was at four o'clock. At eight o'clock Burke Denby came into their room at the hotel with a white face and tense lips.

"Well, Helen, we're in for it," he flung out, dropping himself into the nearest chair.

"What do you mean?"

"Father has cut off my allowance."

"But you—you've gone to work. There's your wages!"

"Oh, yes, there are my—wages."

Something in his tone sent a swift suspicion to her eyes.

"Do you mean—they aren't so big as your allowance?"

"I certainly do."

"How perfectly horrid! Just as if it wasn't mean enough for him not to let us live there, without——"

"Helen!" Burke Denby pulled himself up in his chair. "See here, dear, I shan't let even you say things like that about dad. Now, for heaven's sake, don't let us quarrel about it," he pleaded impatiently, as he saw the dreaded quivering coming to the pouting lips opposite.

"But I—I——"

"Helen, dearest, don't cry, please don't! Crying won't help; and I tell you it's serious business—this is."

"But are you sure—do you know it's true?" faltered the young wife, too thoroughly frightened now to be angry. "Did you see—your father?"

"No; I saw Brett."

"Who's he? Maybe he doesn't know."

"Oh, yes, he does," returned Burke, with grim emphasis. "He knows everything. They say at the Works that he knows what father's going to have for breakfast before the cook does."

"But who is he?"

"He's the head manager of the Denby Iron Works and father's right-hand man. He came here to-night to see me—by dad's orders, I suspect."

"Is your father so awfully angry, then?" Her eyes had grown a bit wistful.

"I'm afraid he is. He says I've made my bed and now I must lie in it. He's cut off my allowance entirely. He's raised my wages—a little, and he says it's up to me now to make good—with my wages."

There was a minute's silence. The man's eyes were gloomily fixed on the opposite wall. His whole attitude spelled disillusion and despair. The woman's eyes, questioning, fearful, were fixed on the man.

Plainly some new, hidden force was at work within Helen Denby's heart. Scorn and anger had left her countenance. Grief and dismay had come in their place.

"Burke, why has your father objected so to—to me?" she asked at last, timidly.

Abstractedly, as if scarcely conscious of what he was saying, the man shrugged:

"Oh, the usual thing. He said you weren't suited to me; you wouldn't make me happy."

The wife recoiled visibly. She gave a piteous little cry. It was too low, apparently, to reach her husband's ears. At all events, he did not turn. For fully half a minute she watched him, and in her shrinking eyes was mirrored each eloquent detail of his appearance, the lassitude, the gloom, the hopelessness. Then, suddenly, to her whole self there came an electric change. As if throwing off bonds that held her she flung out her arms and sprang toward him.

"Burke, it isn't true, it isn't true," she flamed. "I'm going to make you happy! You just wait and see. And we'll show him. We'll show him we can do it! He told you to make good; and you must, Burke! I won't have him and everybody else saying I dragged you down. I won't! I won't! I WON'T!"

Burke Denby's first response was to wince involuntarily at the shrill crescendo of his wife's voice. His next was to shrug his shoulders irritably as the meaning of her words came to him.

"Nonsense, Helen, don't be a goose!" he scowled.

"I'm not a goose. I'm your wife," choked Helen, still swayed by the exaltation that had mastered her. "And I'm going to help you win—win, I say! Do you hear me, Burke?"

"Of course I hear you, Helen; and—so'll everybody else, if you don't look out. Please speak lower, Helen!"

She was too intent and absorbed to be hurt or vexed. Obediently she dropped her voice almost to a whisper.

"Yes, yes, I know, Burke; and I will, I will, dear." She fell on her knees at his side. "But it seems as if I must shout it to the world. I want to go out on the street here and scream it at the top of my voice, till your father in his great big useless house on the hill just has to hear me."

"Helen, Helen!" shivered her husband.

But she hurried on feverishly.

"Burke, listen! You're going to make good. Do you hear? We'll show them. We'll never let them say they—beat us!"

"But—but——"

"We aren't going to say 'but' and hang back. We're going to do!"

"But, Helen, how? What?" demanded the man, stirred into a show of interest at last. "How can we?"

"I don't know, but we're going to do it."

"There won't be—hardly any money."

"I'll get along—somehow."

"And we'll have to live in a cheap little hole somewhere—we can't have one of the Reddingtons."

"I don't want it—now."

"And you'll have to—to work."

"Yes, I know." Her chin was still bravely lifted.

"There can't be any—maid now."

"Then you'll have to eat—what I cook!" She drew in her breath with a hysterical little laugh that was half a sob.

"You darling! I shall love it!" He caught her to himself in a revulsion of feeling that was as ardent as it was sudden. "Only I'll so hate to have you do it, sweetheart—it's so messy and doughy!"

"Nonsense!"

"You told me it was."

"But I didn't know then—what they were saying about me. Burke, they just shan't say I'm dragging you down."

"Indeed they shan't, darling."

"Then you will make good?" she regarded him with tearful, luminous eyes.

"Of course I will—with you to help me."

Her face flamed into radiant joy.

"Yes, with me to help! That's it, that's it—I'm going to help you," she breathed fervently, flinging her arms about his neck.

And to each, from the dear stronghold of the other's arms, at the moment, the world looked, indeed, to be a puny thing, scarcely worth the conquering.

CHAPTER IV

NEST-BUILDING

IT is so much easier to say than to do. But nothing in the experience of either Burke Denby or of Helen, his wife, had demonstrated this fact for them. Quite unprepared, therefore, and with confident courage, they proceeded to pass from the saying to the doing.

True, in the uncompromising sunlight of the next morning, the world did look a bit larger, a shade less easily conquerable; and a distinctly unpleasant feeling of helplessness assailed both husband and wife. Yet with a gay "Now we'll go house-hunting right away so as to save paying here!" from Helen, and an adoring "You darling—but it's a burning shame!" from Burke, the two sallied forth, after the late hotel breakfast.

The matter of selecting the new home was not a difficult one—at first. They decided at once that, if they could not have an apartment in the Reddington Chambers, they would prefer a house. "For," Burke said, "as for being packed away like sardines in one of those abominable little cheap flat-houses, I won't!" So a house they looked for at the start. And very soon they found what Helen said was a "love of a place"—a pretty little cottage with a tiny lawn and a flower-bed.

"And it's so lucky it's for rent," she exulted. "For it's just what we want, isn't it, dearie?"

"Y-yes; but——"

"Why, Burke, don't you like it? I think it's a dear! Of course it isn't like your father's house. But we can't expect that."

"Expect that! Great Scott, Helen,—we can't expect this!" cried the man.

"Why, Burke, what do you mean?"

"It'll cost too much, dear,—in this neighborhood. We can't afford it."

"Oh, that'll be all right. I'll economize somewhere else. Come; it says the key is next door."

"Yes, but, Helen, dearest, I know we can't—" But "Helen, dearest," was already halfway up the adjoining walk; and Burke, with a despairing glance at her radiant, eager face, followed her. There was, indeed, no other course open to him, as he knew, unless he chose to make a scene on the public thoroughfare—and Burke Denby did not like scenes.

The house was found to be as attractive inside as it was out; and Helen's progress from room to room was a series of delighted exclamations. She was just turning to go upstairs when her husband's third desperate expostulation brought her feet and her tongue to a pause.

"Helen, darling, I tell you we can't!" he was exclaiming. "It's out of the question."

"Burke!" Her lips began to quiver.

Less eggs with ROYAL A Cream of Tartar Baking Powder

By the use of Royal Baking Powder, fewer eggs may be used in baking with excellent results.

Many experiments have conclusively demonstrated that in nearly all recipes the number of eggs may be reduced and often omitted altogether by using an additional quantity of Royal, about a teaspoon, in place of each egg omitted.

A booklet of tested recipes, economizing in eggs and other expensive ingredients, will be mailed free. Address Royal Baking Powder Co., 128 William Street, New York City.

The following recipe is a practical illustration. Try it.

CHOCOLATE LAYER CAKE

1½ cups sugar
1 cup milk
2 cups flour
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
¼ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla

DIRECTIONS:—Beat egg yolks until thick; add sugar gradually and beat well. Add vanilla, milk and stiffly beaten whites of eggs; add flour, baking powder and salt, which have been sifted together. Bake in three greased layer cake pans about 15 minutes in hot oven.

(The old method called for 3 eggs)

CHOCOLATE ICING

1½ cups granulated sugar
¾ cup cold water
3 tablespoons cocoa
1 teaspoon vanilla
2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder

DIRECTIONS:—Mix sugar, water, baking powder and cocoa in saucepan and boil without stirring until mixture makes soft ball when tested in cold water. Remove from fire and when bubbling has stopped, pour out on wet platter. Cool, add vanilla and work up with knife until thick enough to spread between layers and on top of cake.

Royal Baking Powder is made from Cream of Tartar, derived from Grapes. Cream of Tartar has no substitute for making a baking powder of the highest quality.

"And when you know how much I want it!"

"Sweetheart, don't, please, make it any harder for me," he begged. "I'd give you a dozen houses like this if I could—and you know it. But we can't afford even this one. The rent is forty dollars. I heard her tell you when she gave you the key."

"Never mind. We can economize other ways."

"But, Helen, I only get sixty all told. We can't pay forty for rent."

"Oh, but, Burke, that leaves twenty, and we can do a lot on twenty. Just as if what we ate would cost us that! I don't care for meat, anyhow, much. We'll cut that out. And I hate grapefruit and olives. They cost a lot. Mrs. Allen was always having them, and——"

The distraught husband interrupted with an impatient gesture.

"Grapefruit and olives, indeed! And as if food were all of it! Where are our clothes and coal and—and doctor's bills, and I don't-know-what-all coming from? Why, great Scott, Helen, I smoke half that in a week, sometimes,—not that I shall now, of course," he added hastily. "But, honestly, dearie, we simply can't do it. Now, come, be a good girl, and let's go on. We're simply wasting time here."

Helen, convinced at last, tossed him the key, with a teary "All right—take it back then. I shan't! I know I should c-cry right before her!" The next minute, at sight of the abject woe and dismay on her husband's face, she flung herself upon him with a burst of sobs.

"There, there, Burke, here I am, so soon, making a fuss because we can't afford things! But I won't any more—truly I won't! I was a mean, horrid old thing! Yes, I was," she reiterated in answer to his indignant denial. "Come, let's go quick!" she exclaimed, pulling herself away, and lifting her head superbly. "I don't want the old place, anyhow. Truly, I don't!" And, with a dazzling smile, she reached out her hand and tripped enticingly ahead of him toward the door; while the man, bewildered, but enthralled by this extraordinary leap from fretful stubbornness to gay docility, hurried after her with an incoherent jumble of rapturous adjectives.

Such was Mr. and Mrs. Burke Denby's first experience of home-hunting. The second, though different in detail, was similar in disappointment. So also were the third and the fourth experiences. Not, indeed, until the weary, distracted pair had spent three days in time, all their patience, and most of their good nature, did they finally arrive at a decision. And then their selection, alas, proved to be one of the despised tiny flats, in which, according to the unhappy young bridegroom, they were destined to be packed like sardines.

After all, it had been the "elegant mirror in the parlor," and the "just grand" tiled and tessellated entrance that had been the determining factors in the decision; for Burke, thankful that at last something within reach of his pocketbook had been found to bring a sparkle to his beloved's eyes, had stifled his own horror at the tawdry cheapness of it all, and had given a consent that was not without a measure of relief born of the three long days of weary, well-nigh hopeless search.

Dalton, like most manufacturing towns of fifteen or twenty thousand souls, had all the diversity of a much larger place. There was West Hill, where were the pillared and porticoed residences of the pretentious and the pretending, set in painfully new, wide-sweeping, flower-bordered lawns; and there was Valley Street, a double line of ramshackle wooden buildings with broken steps and shutterless windows, where a blade of grass was a stranger and a flower unknown, save for perhaps a sickly geranium on a tenement window sill. There was Old Dalton, with its winding, tree-shaded streets clambering all over the slope of Elm Hill, where old colonial mansions, with an air of aloofness (borrowed quite possibly from their occupants), seemed ever to be withdrawing farther and farther away from plebeian noise and publicity. There was, of course, the mill district, where were the smoke-belching chimneys and great black buildings that meant the town's bread and butter; and there were the adjoining streets of workmen's houses, fitted to give a sensitive soul the horrors, so seemingly endless was the repetition of covered stoop and dormer window, always exactly the same, as far as eye could reach. There was, too, the bustling, asphalted, brick-blocked business center; and there were numerous streets of simple, pretty cottages, and substantial residences, among which, with growing frequency, there were beginning to appear the tall, many-windowed apartment houses, ranging all the way from the exclusive, expensive Reddington Chambers down to the flimsy structures like the one whose tawdry ornamentation had caught the fancy of Burke Denby's village-bred wife.

To Burke Denby himself, late of Denby House (perhaps the most aloof of all the "old colonials"), the place was a nightmare of horror. But because his wife's eyes had glistened, and because his wife's lips had caroled a joyous "Oh, Burke, I'd love this place, darling!"—and because, most important of all, if it must be confessed, the rent was only twenty dollars a month, he had uttered a grim "All right, we'll take it." And the selection of the home was accomplished.

Not until they were on the way to the hotel that night did there come to the young husband the full realizing sense that housekeeping meant furniture.

"Oh, of course I knew it did," he groaned, half-laughingly, after his first despairing ejaculation. "But I just didn't think; that's all. Our furniture at home we'd always had. But of course it does have to be bought—at first."

"Of course! And I didn't think, either," laughed Helen. "You see, we'd always had our furniture, too, I guess. But then, it'll be grand to buy it. I love new things!"

Burke Denby frowned.

"Buy it! That's all right—if we had the money to pay. Heaven only knows how much it'll cost. I don't."

"But, Burke, you've got some money, haven't you? You took a big roll out of your pocket last night."

He gave her a scornful glance.

"Big roll, indeed! How far do you suppose that would go toward furnishing a home? Of course I've got some money—a little left from my allowance—but that doesn't mean I've got enough to furnish a home."

"Then let's give up housekeeping and board," proposed Helen. "Then we won't have to buy any furniture. And I think I'd like it better anyhow; and I know you would—after you'd sampled my cooking," she finished laughingly.

But her husband did not smile. The frown only deepened as he ejaculated:

"Board! Not much, Helen! We couldn't board at a decent place. 'Twould cost too much. And as for the cheap variety of boarding-house, I wonder if you think I'd stand for that! Heaven knows we'll be enough gossiped about, as it is, without our planting ourselves right under the noses of half the tabby-cats in town for them to 'oh' and 'ah' and 'um' every time we turn around or don't turn around! No, ma'am, Helen! We'll shut ourselves up somewhere within four walls we can call home, even if we have to furnish it with only two chairs and a bed and a kitchen stove. It'll be ours—and we'll be where we won't be stared at."

Helen laughed lightly.

"Dear, dear, Burke, how you do run on! Just as if one minded a little staring! I rather like it, myself,—if I know my clothes and my back hair are all right."

"Ugh! Helen!"

"Well, I do," she laughed, uptilting her chin. "It makes one feel so sort of —er—important. But I won't say 'board' again, never,—unless you begin to scold at my cooking," she finished with an arch glance.

"As if I could do that!" cried the man promptly, again the adoring husband. "I shall love everything you do—just because it's you that do it. The only trouble will be, you won't get enough to eat—because I shall want to eat it all!"

"You darling! Aren't you the best ever!" she cooed, giving his arm a surreptitious squeeze. "But, really, you know, I am going to be a bang-up cook. I've got a cookbook."

"So soon? Where did you get that?"

"Yesterday, while you went into Stoddard's for that house-key. I saw one in the window next door and I went in and bought it. 'Twas two dollars, so it ought to be a good one. And that makes me think. It took all the money I had, 'most, in my purse. So I—I'm afraid I'll have to have some more, dear."

"Why, of course, of course! You mustn't go without money a minute." And the young husband, with all the alacrity of a naturally generous nature, supplemented by the embarrassment of this new experience of being asked for money by the girl he loved, plunged his hand into his pocket and crowded two bills into her unresisting fingers. "There! And I won't be so careless again, dear. I don't ever mean you to have to ask for money, sweetheart."

"Oh, thank you," she murmured tucking the bills into her little handbag. "I shan't need any more for ever so long, I'm sure. I'm going to be economical now, you know."

"Of course you are. You're going to be a little brick. I know."

"And we won't mind anything if we're only together," she breathed.

"There won't be anything to mind," he answered fervently, with an ardent glance that would have been a kiss had it not been for the annoying presence of a few score of Dalton's other inhabitants on the street together with themselves.

The next minute they reached the hotel.

chapel. It is uplifting to see both rooms filled to the last inch of space with an attentive military congregation. Often many more are standing in the aisles. The space is insufficient, or we should often have 2,000 instead of 400 or 500. After the German soldiers' service there is the walk to the prison camp, and then at once the service for the English. I am heartily glad to be able to administer the Word to all soldiers, our own and others. In the infirmaries and hospitals there is also plenty of opportunity for Gospel work, in order that the clear ray of the Word may shine in many a heart.

"Besides the services in the camps, which take place on the third and fourth Sundays of each month, I also visit the camp at Stadmuehle regularly once a month. At noon on the third Sunday the Australian prisoners meet together in Altenbecken and hold a service there with me in the little evangelical church. Likewise I visit regularly on Wednesday evening the important infirmary at the dairy camp, where a pleasant and devout English orderly is a great help to me in the arrangements he makes for my services.

"During my journey to Muenster in Westphalia, I wanted to look up some people in Sendenhorst; there were only three of them. The overseer had given them a free noon hour, so that they might receive me and hold a service with me. At our greeting it transpired that one of them had a certain scruple, and hesitated as to whether he should come to my service. 'Why?' I inquired. 'Well,' said he, 'you see, I belong to the Anglican Church, and have been forbidden by my religious director to make the sign of the cross.' I set his mind at rest and invited all three to come with us into the schoolroom, which had been set in order. I did not tell him who I was; but when he and his companions saw that I was putting on the Anglican canonicals, they opened their eyes in surprise, and finally when they heard the prayers familiar to them in the short form of service, and saw that I joined with them in their own hymns, they were all attention, and their hearty handshake was proof of their gratitude. During my address I spoke to them of the cross of Christ, and what it means to us, and how we should turn to it. All three of them begged me to come again.

Why experts select Thermoid Brake Lining

These car makers and their engineers select Thermoid Brake Lining because they find by scientific tests that it gives consistently efficient SERVICE. They find its "coefficient of friction" is ideal for a brake lining.

This means its entire construction is such that brakes equipped with Thermoid Brake Lining cannot grab or slip, no matter how thin Thermoid becomes throughout long usage.

A grabbing or slipping brake lining is a constant source of danger to the motorist.

Three tests prove Thermoid Brake Lining's worth

Thermoid Brake Lining proves its superiority in passing all three drastic tests by which brake lining efficiency is determined—Coefficient of Friction Test—Absorption Test—Durability Test.

Scientific construction of Thermoid Brake Lining

The reason Thermoid Brake Lining has the ideal coefficient of friction, is impervious to moisture, and is durable, lies in its scientific construction. In its process of manufacture it has three exclusive features:

1. It has 40% more material by actual weight

This means longer service, best service. Thermoid is 40% heavier than any woven brake lining, not hydraulic compressed. That is why it is better fitted to stand the responsibilities placed on it.

2. It is Grapnalized

Thermoid brake lining is impregnated throughout with Grapnal. This exclusive process makes it impervious to gasoline, oil, water, dust, etc. No other brake lining is Grapnalized, or can be. That is why ordinary brake lining goes to pieces rapidly.

3. It is Hydraulic Compressed

Powerful hydraulic presses compress Thermoid into a solid mass. This makes it far tougher and stronger than loosely woven linings, not hydraulic compressed. It makes the wearing surface ideal for braking; it can't grab and it can't slip. The "coefficient of friction" is just right.

Specify Thermoid

When you reline your brakes, specify the brake lining the experts specify—Thermoid. Jobbers, garages, and dealers will be glad to supply you.

Remember your life depends on the efficiency of your brakes, and the efficiency of your brakes depends on your brake lining. Be sure your brakes are lined with Thermoid Brake Lining. The cost is a little more—and well worth it.

Guarantee—
We guarantee Thermoid to have a more uniform gripping power and to outwear and give more satisfactory service than any other lining. Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL.

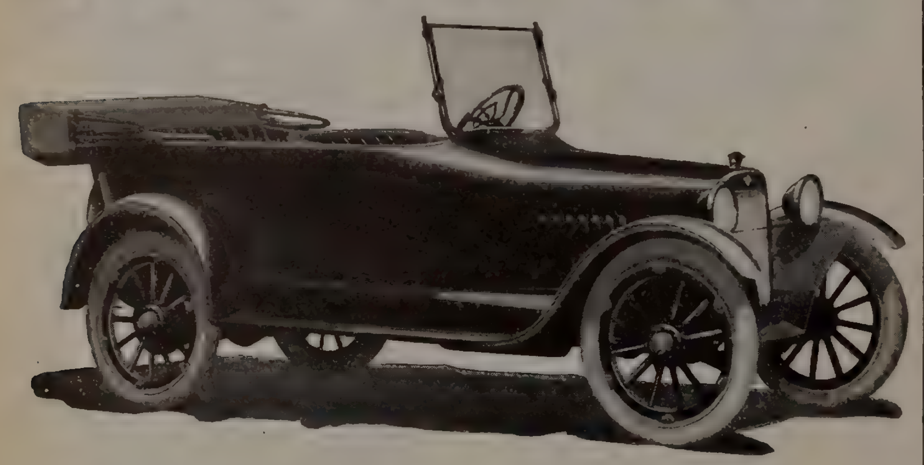
SAXON "SIX"



A Car in Which the Unusual Seems the Usual

In every phase of Saxon "Six" performance you'll find that its average would be noteworthy and unusual if established by another.

It is true, too, in regard to its speed, its power, its quietness of operation, and its smoothness of power-flow.

Only recently, in a test, a certain well known car of less than six cylinders showed 1512.72 power impulses per minute at a speed of 20 miles per hour.

Under the same conditions Saxon "Six" showed 2993.925 impulses per minute at equal speed.

Simply told, there is the story—Saxon "Six" developed nearly 98% more impulses per minute at that speed.

Consequently each impulse was far less severe on all moving parts at any given time, practically all vibration was eliminated, and nearly absolute continuity of power-flow was obtained.

In terms of acceleration it means that this car of fewer cylinders will pick-up from a stand 22% slower than Saxon "Six."

And it means, further, that as compared to this less-cylinder motor, Saxon "Six" will develop far greater pulling power with no noticeable difference in smoothness.

Saxon "Six" is $865; "Six" Sedan, $1250; "Four" Roadster, $495; f. o. b. Detroit. Canadian prices: "Six" Touring Car, $1175; "Six" Sedan, $1675; "Four" Roadster, $665. Price of special export models, "Six," $915; "Four," $495; f. o. b. Detroit. (963) not see her again until I was sentenced to six years at hard labour in Sing Sing Prison by Judge Cowing.

THE WICKED JOHN GOODE

"With the few dollars she gave me I got beastly drunk. I met an old acquaintance who tipped me off to a good thing. I needed money quickly if I was to make use of this information. A car soon brought me to the home of my wife's old friend, this woman who was again befriending her. On other occasions I had stolen from her, but because of her friendship for Jane she had refused to prosecute me. I entered her house and stole an expensive silver service. I was caught, tried, convicted, sentenced, and away I went, with my wife promising me her continued love and support and begging me to turn over a new leaf. Again I promised her I would.

'I was an interesting and strange creature as with nineteen others I was taken over the New York Central to Sing Sing to serve my last 'bit.' The fact that I was going to 'stir' didn't disturb me. I felt no shame or remorse over that. Nor did I regret the act for which I had been sent away. My friends had deserted me, the old 'pull,' which had safeguarded me so many times, had been withdrawn, and I was sore. I wanted to get even.

'One by one the big events in my life passed in review before my eyes. I saw my mother and my father. I saw the Judge who drove me out of St. Louis as a boy. I saw Jimmy Lally and the 'screws' and keepers who had mauled and beaten me in all the different places where I had done time. And then I saw my wife in her poverty and anguish of heart. So far as any effect was concerned I might as well have been thinking of the moon or the stars. All emotion, all feeling of right, all honour, were buried in me.

"The Wicked John Goode" is being published for the book trade at $1.00. The Christian Herald has arranged for a special popular edition for Christian Herald subscribers, and the complete story, with the foreword by Thomas Mott Osborne, and an epilogue by Rev. J.G. Hallimond, President of the Bowery Mission, will be sent to any address in the United States for 60c postpaid.

THE tremendous interest taken in "The Wicked John Goode" in serial form, and the popularity of the man himself as an evangelist representing the Bowery Mission, has impelled us to republish the story of "The Wicked John Goode" in book form.

Truly it is an astonishing narrative. A plain unvarnished tale, with a glory that demonstrates anew the redemptive and transforming power of Christ. John Goode was everything that was evil, a drunkard, a jailbird and a thief. Today he is one of the leaders of the famous Bowery Mission.

This story of his redemption is ablaze with the light of the Cross—a final and perfect answer to every "doubting Thomas" who cries for proof.

CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City

there has been an important Kommando for almost two years. At the beginning there were more than eighty men there, but gradually they have decreased to about thirty. The evangelical leader, Under-Officer Moeller, at first turned to me, and since then I have been there three times. It is a difficult place to reach. Toward daylight we arrived in Henglam, after a march of two hours and a half. There the good innkeeper's wife had already prepared hot coffee. How happy then were the prisoners, who were already old friends! Soon a dozen more men arrived from another section in a neighboring village, and we marched to the schoolhouse through this wholly Catholic village, in which our service for prisoners was the first evangelical service ever held. Even in captivity the English keep up their outward appearances: they are well dressed, and brushed, and clean shaved. We had musicians, too, one fiddler, one man with a flute, one with a clarionette, and a trumpeter. They had chosen hymns for the service and had practiced well, and there was even a small prelude and recessional. The prayers and psalms were repeated aloud, and the men were attentive, although it was quite cold in the unheated schoolroom.

"After the service I visited the men again in their quarters, the old school, where a cheerful fire was burning. They gladly took tracts, and many begged me heartily not to forget them. At the noon meal we sat together with Section Leader M——, who for more than two years has been shut up in this village and separated from his family, and torn away from his business. We gladly bore him company for an hour, and left an inspiration with him.

"THE English from the village of Haaren, ten kilometers farther on, had not come to the service at Henglam—it was too far for them. On Sunday the prisoners want to sleep and make themselves a good breakfast. On the whole, one cannot deny the men these joys, and it must seem quite right to us that our prisoners should receive so many packages from their homes that they can put by something in our time of scarcity. Moreover, one may notice from the prisoners' packages that in France, and also in England, they cannot always obtain a full supply: bacon and potted meats grow rarer, and also the packages in general.

"And so the section in Haaren had not come, to the vexation of Section Leader M—— and the disappointment of their comrades. As the matter stood, there were eleven Englishmen in Haaren and the place was ten kilometers distant. I had time, as we had only to get the train at seven in the evening to Paderborn. Then the women put in a good word for the English at Haaren. My good little wife said that if it was not too much for me, she was ready for the walk, and the landlady, too, encouraged the plan. How, then, could I refuse? So, right after dinner, we started on our march. Section Leader M—— accompanied us a part of the way.

"At half-past two, after a brisk walk, we came to our destination, where we were received in friendly fashion at the inn, refreshed with good coffee and thickly spread bread and butter—which reminded us of the good old times—and at three o'clock I was ready for the service. The section leader brought me into the old, pleasant house, where the English and French prisoners are quartered. Only seven of the eleven Englishmen were there; the other four were making visits in the families of peasants with whom they were acquainted. The seven were ashamed when I told them I had acted according to the Arabian saying, 'When the mountain won't come to Mohammed, Mohammed must go to the mountain.' Different ones ran about, one to make a cup of tea, another to get me English biscuits and raisin cakes. But I needed nothing, and began at once to sing with them, and how attentive they were! They had not dreamed that I and my wife would trouble ourselves to come to them. Among the seven Englishmen were three brothers, who, one after another, had been taken into captivity in Germany, and to whom the German military authorities had shown the kindness of uniting them in the same country section. They are Scotch, and the Scotch in the German prison camps are preferred, I believe, to all the other prisoners. Four of the English in Haaren entrusted me with messages for Superintendent Klingender, of whom they have cherished a grateful remembrance.

"During the service my wife waited for me in the inn (it is not permitted for women to take part in a service for prisoners). There she was conversing with a lieutenant, a Pomeranian, who was in the village for the inspection of the Kommandos. He, too, had to go to Driburg to reach the train for Paderborn, and he was not for walking. He procured a carriage, the cost of which we gladly shared with him. And so we were spared a repetition of the two hours' walk. It was providential. A heavy mist had descended, the road had become even more slippery, and the darkness fell soon. Before leaving I had distributed a pack of books and tracts among the prisoners.

"DURING my last journey in the grand duchy of Baden, I visited the chief chaplain, Mr. Schloemann, who wanted to hear of the pastoral care of the English prisoners, and gave us the information that he had appointed a pastor of Baden, a former missionary of the Basel Missionary Society, to visit the English prisoners regularly. As I made a move to go, this officer of the church (he is the ecclesiastical councilor) asked me, 'Have you called on the grand duchess? She has more than once expressed the wish to have from you personally an account of what is being done in a religious way for the English prisoners.' The councilor promised to procure an interview. So I stayed over in Baden-Baden on my return from Switzerland with my wife and little daughter, on October 15, and went at the appointed hour (four o'clock) to the castle of Baden. There I was soon introduced to her royal highness by the councilor and Chamberlain von Chelius. From her friendly words and questions I soon gathered that she was already informed concerning the circumstances of the pastoral care for the prisoners. Her friendliness and sympathy soon took away all my embarrassment, and her unaffected manner and motherly cordiality made it easy for me to tell my story. At the same time it became more and more clear to me that her interest was prompted by a desire for participation in a great work of Christian charity. Twice, three times, I tried to rise and go, but the grand duchess held me back and wanted to hear more, and had more questions. One remark which among others the honorable lady made about the spiritual work, will remain written on my heart: 'My dear pastor, do you know,' she said, 'the parable of the sower seems to me to be important because of its beginning—"A sower went forth to sow?" For this the workers of the Lord must be ready, at the very beginning. A sower went forth to sow.'"

Contributions in aid of the Gospel Committee for Work among War Prisoners will be welcomed by the Christian Herald and duly acknowledged.

The first night at family prayers, the family were much surprised at grandpa's agitation and very short prayer. Being questioned, he replied: "Guess you'd be agitated with those two rascals tickling your feet."

How a Failure at Sixty Won Sudden Success

From Poverty to $40,000 a Year

A Lesson for Old and Young Alike

By R. D. RAINES

The old-time millionaire "made his pile" by squeezing the pennies, by overwork and self-denial. A much bigger army of men today are piling up millions without denying themselves the comforts and little luxuries of life—by giving up poor jobs for better ones, by preserving their health and strength, and by retaining their manhood and independence all through the struggle. Theirs is a new secret and one well worth learning.

Our story is about one who learned it an old man who got hold of some of these young ideas. If you could have met him in the summer of 1915 you would have pitied him. For forty years he had been true to the old creed—hard work, long hours, patience, faithfulness, and economy. By dint of scrimping and scraping he would save a few dollars only to have them swept away by a season of illness in his family.

And his reward? It came at sixty, when he was thrown out of employment, onto the scrap-heap.

His old-fashioned rules for winning success had failed to work. "What was wrong with them or with him?"

He reviewed, one by one, the careers of some of his old business associates who had prospered. A suspicion entered his mind. He turned his attention to several young men who were forging rapidly to the front. Suspicion became conviction. In one respect all those men were identically alike. The climbing youngsters and the prosperous oldsters were strong-willed fellows of determined purpose. It was almost amusing, the way he and others of his kind scurried to get out of the way of these men whenever they set out to accomplish any purpose.

Slowly the full truth came to him. Success was not a matter of age. It was not luck. It was not even a matter of opportunity. It was simply a question of dominating will power—determination that brooks no interference, commands respect, and easily leaps all obstacles.

Somewhere, lying dormant within him like an unused muscle, he too possessed a will. He knew it. He would uncover it. He would exercise and train it and put it to work.

For a long time he had believed he could make a success in a certain line of manufacturing. He had some new ideas about it. But he had never been bold enough to even mention his thoughts to others. Now he sought out some business friends. Instead of begging a small loan with which to pay his rent, he presented and explained his plans for launching a business of his own. His friends' first response was to smile. But as they listened they were struck by a new note in the old man's voice, a new self-confident poise in his bearing; his tone was magnetic, compelling; his argument sound and convincing. This gentleman was not to be denied.

In two days he raised $600 capital for his plant. Three days later his little factory was in operation. In three months he repaid every penny of the loan and at the end of one year his books showed profits of $20,000, and his second year's operations promise $35,000 to $40,000 more.

A better understanding of the tremendous power of the human will as a force in business and in fortune building may be had by studying the successes of any of our big money makers.

Interesting and inspiring are several cases that have come to my personal attention, because the same methods are open to us all no matter how young or how old we may be.

One is that of a man who was $6,000 in debt three years ago. Since then he has accumulated $200,000 without speculating and today is earning $1,000 a week. He is only one of many who frankly credit their good fortune to Prof. Frank Channing Haddock and his very remarkable book, "Power of Will." Another is a young man who worked in a big factory. One day he met Mr. W. M. Taylor, the noted efficiency expert, who advised him to read "Power of Will." He did so, applied himself to the training of his will, and in less than one year his salary was increased to more than eight times what he had been earning.

Then there is the case of C. D. Van Vechten, General Agent of the Northwestern Life Insurance Company. After his first examination of Prof. Haddock's methods and lessons in will power development, as published in "Power of Will," he told the author that they would be worth $3,000 to $30,000 to him.

Another man, Mr. H. D. Ferguson, residing in Hot Springs, Ark., increased his earnings from $40 a week to $90 a week in a remarkably short space of time after he began the study of will training. Will power training by Haddock's system has enabled thousands to conquer drink and other vices almost overnight—has helped overcome sickness and nervousness—has transformed unhappy, envious, discontented people into dominating personalities filled with the joy of living.

In this new book Prof. Haddock, whose name ranks with Bergson, James, and Royce in the scientific world, has given to the world for the first time a practical, simple system of rules and exercise for will power training that has completely revolutionized the lives of thousands of people. For the will is just as susceptible to exercise and training as any muscle of the body.

"Power of Will" is being distributed by the Pelton Publishing Co. of Meriden, Conn. Any reader who cares to examine the book may do so without sending any money. If, after five days, you do not feel that this book is worth the $3 asked for it, return it and you will owe nothing.

Some few doubters will scoff at the idea of will power being the key to wealth and achievement. But intelligent men and women will investigate for themselves by sending for the book at the publisher's risk.

Among the 150,000 owners who have read, used, and praised "Power of Will" are such prominent men as Supreme Court Justice Parker; Wu Ting Fang, ex-U. S. Chinese Ambassador, Lieut.-Gov. McKelvie of Nebraska; Assistant Postmaster General Britt; General Manager Christeson, of Wells Fargo Express Co.; E. St. Elmo Lewis; Governor Arthur Capper of Kansas, and thousands of others equally prominent.

As a first step in will training, act on your present impulse to write a letter or address this coupon to the Pelton Publishing Company, 112-H Wilcox Block, Meriden, Conn., and the book will come by return mail. This one act may mean the turning point of your life. Do not hesitate. (Advertisement).

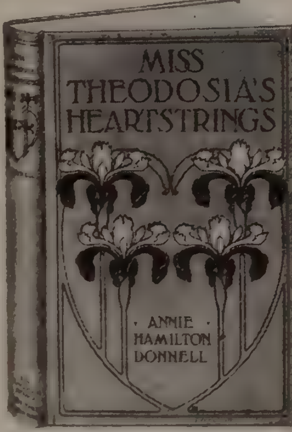
Theodosia's Heartstrings



IN this irresistible novel of happiness, Miss Theodosia Baxter wandered up and down the world for three years in search of something to interest her, only to come home and find it on the upper step of her own front porch. They were two of the Flagg children who lived in the house next door—Evangeline the voluble and little Elly Precious, who possessed six toes. Ere long Miss Theodosia made the acquaintance of Stefena, the eldest and little deaf Carruthers. How this quartette of youngsters reached the heart of the staid and travel-worn woman and eventually brought a romance into her own life is set forth in Mrs. Donnell's characteristic style.

We will send a copy of "Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.
Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

How Lying Undermines Character

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Lev. 19 : 11, 12; Prov. 6 : 16–19

A FALSEHOOD is the refuge of the coward; a lie the favorite weapon of the crook. The hatred of falsehood is born in us, yet few of us are strong enough to be truthful at all times. A falsehood is born usually either of fear or of a desire for something beyond what we have a right to expect. Persons who wish to move in the best society wear the clothes and affect the graces of the class they covet. This pretense, if acted long enough, may result in the complete loss of the power to value life in its proper terms. In the selling of merchandise there is great temptation to falsehood. Every person selling goods is anxious to reach the largest possible total of sales. Sometimes the sale seems to hinge upon such a very little falsehood that it looks almost criminal to risk the loss of trade by strict adherence to the truth. Yet the little falsehood soon grows into greater ones, until the ambitious salesman finds himself unable to sell anything, because no one has faith in his word.

Sometimes a little mistake is covered for the moment by a trifling falsehood. Perhaps we lose something and deny having seen it, or we are able to lay a mistake upon an absent associate. Every little lie of this kind has to be followed up by a larger lie in order that we may remain consistent, and soon the whole fabric of falsehood falls about our ears, and even if we do not lose our position we lose the respect of those with whom we work. Falsehood is like drink: a little always leads to more, and as a man makes progress toward perfection in lying he loses one by one the marks of self-respect and the attributes of honorable manhood, until at last he finds himself outside the pale of confidence of all who know him, unable to get himself believed no matter how trifling his statement. Once the habit of lying is acquired, he falsifies even when the truth would much better serve his purposes. The one who is always truthful can face brightest noonday or blackest midnight in peace and strength, but the liar sees danger in every shadow, and the echoes of his own footsteps pursue him from terror to terror. Each lie requires a new falsehood to support it, and each falsehood bears its train of new terrors by night and new fears by day. The liar soon becomes a craven coward and a moral outcast.

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 12 : 10, 16; Acts 26 : 2, 3, 26

THE days of chivalry are full of fine stories of gentle courtesies. Even our colonial history and the period of the Revolution yield tales in which the strong have ministered chivalrously to the fair, and the speech of those epochs, as it has come down to us, is full of pretty phrases meant to please. While there was much that was crude in the centuries gone, which even pretty speech could not cover, yet our ideas of chivalry and courtesy are largely inherited from our ancestors of those periods preceding and even including the colonial days. We of today are much too direct at times to stop for courtesies which seem meaningless; and yet courtesy is only one outcropping of love, one of the manifestations of brotherly kindness which should be a mark of Christian fellowship. The church is an organization of Christians for service, organized because two people working together can accomplish more than twice as much as one alone. When two are together, the purposes of the two must be merged into a common purpose. There will be no working at cross purposes if each "in honor prefers the other." If each is willing to decrease that the other may abound, there will be no complaints that So-and-So is "trying to run the whole League." Christian courtesy does not mean fawning servility, but it does mean willingness to yield when yielding will bring accomplishment, willingness to "play second fiddle" if our playing it will complete

The Sweetest Thing in the World

About the sweetest thing in the world is a baby just after he is bathed and powdered. Especially if he's your own baby!!

The powdering (generally with Mennen's Borated Talcum) is as much a part of the bath as the bath itself. And it's mainly the powder that soothes his frets and makes baby so sweet and cheerful.

Think what it must have been to be a baby before the days of Mennen's (the first Borated Talcum).

In the last few years, mothers have been learning that what helped make baby sweet and content—helped when baby got older.

And nowadays many a belle with laughing eyes and an atmosphere of cheery freshness owes much of both to generous use of Mennen's.

To meet these more generous and more general uses—we are even making the sifter top cans larger and more generous.

Put a tin in every bathroom and every bedroom in your house.

Say nothing,—and note the cheerful effect on the family's disposition!

Out of the hundreds of brands of Talcum Powder—two or three may be as good as Mennen's. But it is easy to be sure. Ask by name for Mennen's Borated Talcum.

the harmony of effort of the League. If we feel that it is vital that a thing should be done a certain way, we are much more liable to bring it about by commending all that is worth while in the plans of others than by insisting that our plans only are sufficient for success. Courtesy is defined as "politeness originating in kindliness and exercised habitually." We must not forget the habitual element. Intermittent courtesy, like an intermittent spring, frequently flows at the wrong time. We cannot be courteous today and curt and cutting tomorrow. Courtesy, kindliness, loving helpfulness, these commend to others the Master whom we profess to serve; they verify our confession.

Reformation Celebration Plans

PLANS and activities for the observance of the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Protestant Reformation are broadening and gathering force. At least fifteen denominational bodies have appointed committees to promote interest in the appropriate celebration of the work of Luther and the other Reformation leaders. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has appointed an important committee, whose function it will be to further the celebration in its thirty constituent denominational bodies. The chairman is Rev. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. Rev. Howard R. Gold is secretary.

The most complete quadricentennial organization is the Joint Lutheran Committee, with offices at Philadelphia. This committee represents several Lutheran bodies. The chairman is Rev. T. E. Schmauk of Lebanon, Pa. The executive secretary is Rev. Howard R. Gold. Local committees have been organized in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Los Angeles, Topeka, Spokane, Charleston, Savannah and other cities. The New York committee maintains a well-equipped office and is promoting study of the history of the Reformation and its significance in and around New York City. Hundreds of addresses have been given under the auspices of this committee, and other hundreds of study classes have been organized in churches, Sunday schools, colleges, and through other agencies in the metropolitan district.

Mr. Roberts and Mr. Gold have issued circulars addressed to the colleges and universities of the country, urging their participation in the celebration of the nailing of the epoch-making ninety-five theses by Luther upon the doors of the church at Wittenberg, and another circular addressed especially to churches and Sunday schools.

In celebration of the quadricentennial throughout the coming months, culminating October 31, there will be sermons, lectures, study classes, a system of publicity reaching the whole country through the religious and secular press, lists of books and pamphlets and study subjects carefully prepared, a popular life of Luther by a well-known American writer, and appropriate medals. Other features will be exhibits in various cities, tableaux and pageants. A memorial arch and Luther statues are projected.

Protestantism will be under fire this year. Attacks from Catholic sources are already being made in pulpit and press and through pamphlets and books. This is inevitable and to be expected. It will be a good time for Protestants to learn anew the reasons for the faith that is in them and to study the life and character of the great man who has perhaps had more influence upon the religious, political and social life and thinking of the world than any other since Paul fought his great and good fight.

Every Protestant church should celebrate the Reformation quadricentennial, not merely by a sermon in October, but by a course of study and reading carried on through the coming months, as well as by lectures, programs, tableaux and pageants. Informational literature may be secured by application to Rev. Howard R. Gold, 925 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

AMERICAN FLAG

For All Occasions

HAVE you a good United States Flag for use on holidays—in fact on any day during these strenuous times? If not, here is an opportunity to get one—a well made flag, 4 x 6 feet.

Some time ago we decided to make a special flag offer to our readers. Thousands of these flags were placed in Christian Herald homes throughout the country. Perhaps we ordered too many, or perhaps the particular occasion for which flags were wanted had gone by. At any rate, we were left with a few fine flags on hand, but now is the time when every good American should be able to display "Old Glory."

The illustration is an exact photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. It is made by the Dunkards, of Pennsylvania. To insure durability, the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent, bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. The pole is NOT included.

SPECIAL OFFER

We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, to any present subscriber who will send us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

SPECIAL OFFER

We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal), all for $3.00.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

IT is written of the risen Lord that, on the evening of the day of his resurrection, he walked with two of his disciples some five or six miles into the country to the little town of Emmaus, where he first opened to them the Scriptures regarding himself and then was made known to them in the breaking of bread. These disciples welcomed the apparent stranger and poured out to him the questionings of their hearts. Jesus, the same risen Lord, is walking today with us. We may not know him; unbelief may blind our eyes and bar our hearts to him; but if we lay our doubts and fear and hopes before him on the altar of prayer, he will be made known to us and will break for us the bread of life and send us back with radiant faces to declare, as did those two so long ago, "The Lord is risen indeed."

F. D. M. asks the sympathetic prayers of the League for divine guidance and comfort in a grave bereavement, when human sympathy seems powerless to comfort, and the soul seems unable to avail itself of the privilege of prayer.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Decherd, Tenn.; Marshall, Texas; Tombstone, Ariz.; Held, Ore.; Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, Canada; Winesap, Wash.; Louisville, Ky.; Minneapolis, Minn. (that many may be saved during revival); Dunellen, N. J. ("pray for the success of revival"); Jerseyville, Ill. (that many may be saved during revival); Wolfeboro, N. H. (that many may be saved during evangelistic meetings); Danielsville, Ga. ("pray for the success of a revival here"); Miami, Texas ("that many may be saved during revival meetings here"); Grand Island, Neb. ("that the tabernacle meetings going on here may be a big success"); Detroit, Mich. ("pray for Gospel meetings to be conducted in the Church of the Redeemer by Rev. W. Taylor Joyce"); Plainfield, N. J. ("pray that nine people may be saved"); M. S. D., Elgin, Texas ("that a minister may be sent to our church"); Miss S. T. A., South Carver, Mass. ("that a Spirit-filled minister may be sent to the M. E. Church here").

Nineteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including S. L. B., that five sons may be saved; another, A Mother, that son may be saved and return home; nine wives, their husbands; forty-four, other relatives or friends.

Ten readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Eighty-one ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including A. L. R., that pastor may be restored to health; another, Mrs. W. H. C., that husband may be healed without an operation; seventy friends ask for healing for themselves, including Mrs. W. and Mrs. B. S., to be cured of cancer; another, Mrs. E. C. W., that health may be restored without an operation; another, Mrs. A. J. B., "that I may regain the use of hands and limbs."

Thirty-six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

Three parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; ten friends, for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves, friends or relatives.

Five friends ask prayer that their sight may be strengthened; Mrs. L. K. P., that father's eyes, Miss B., that sister's, may be healed.

Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Six parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit: two wives, their husbands; A. D. Y., "that I may be cured of the liquor habit"; J. B. C. and Mrs. S. H. S. ask prayer that friends may be cured of the liquor habit

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Save Waste of Lumber

Ordinary building methods waste on an average of 18% of the lumber you pay for. Think of it! $18 out of every $100 goes to the waste pile and is burned up for kindling wood. Of course, the lumber that is wasted costs just as much as the lumber that is used. Are you willing to pay $180 on every $1000 worth of lumber for waste? This is an important item to consider, especially when lumber prices are advancing. The Aladdin system saves you this unnecessary expense—puts the $18 from every $100 into your pocket. Aladdin Readi-Cut Houses are cut-to-fit in our mills. You pay for the material used in your house—no more.

120 Page Book "ALADDIN HOMES"

The big book "Aladdin Homes" shows over a hundred attractive bungalows and dwellings from $341 for a 5-Room home to homes valued at $8,000 complete. Many attractive low cost garages—from the single car garage at $54 to the largest size built for three touring cars. Barns of different types from $250 for a complete barn to the largest and most complete type designed. This big book will help you plan your home, help you to save money on your building, help you to build it in less time than usually required. Let us send you a copy of "Aladdin Homes" No. 214. Send stamps today—it will be sent by return mail.

Hygeia Nursing Bottle

because he knows that it is the easiest bottle to keep surgically clean.

ITS wide mouth makes it as easy to wash as a tumbler. The mother or nurse can actually get her fingers and a cloth into it, while running water can reach every spot on its inner surface. The dangerous bottle-brush is unnecessary.

When you wash and sterilize a Hygeia Nursing Bottle it is surgically clean and it stays so.

No food particles can remain on its smooth surfaces to catch and breed germs. In fact you can safely trust its washing to a servant.

The non-collapsible rubber breast can be instantly turned inside-out for thorough cleaning and sterilization. So closely does it conform to the human breast that weaning is extremely easy and natural feeding is promoted.

As an additional safeguard, tight-fitting rubber covers for the Hygeia are provided to keep baby's food free from contamination while in the ice box.

A physician designed the Hygeia for his own babies. He omitted no feature that he thought might ward off sicknesses. It is absolutely safe.

Be sure the name HYGEIA is on every part of the nursing outfit you purchase

These people, massed on Boston Common, under the leadership of their Governor, pledged anew their loyalty to America

CONGRESS DECIDES FOR WAR

IT was a light-hearted people that went to war with Spain. We entered that conflict with a song on our lips. War had a glamour and a romance about it, the liberating of an enslaved race gave a new meaning to liberty, and the terrors of the sixties had been forgotten in a new generation which had not known armed conflict. So we made a gala time of the period of enlistment, and our rapid victories and the early peace added to the glory of war, in spite of commissary scandals and the ravages of tropical fevers.

The nation goes to war today with no song upon its lips, but with a prayer instead, and with a high determination to see it through and to pay the cost in gold and life and heartache, assured that once again America unsheathes her sword in defense of liberty—as the President said, "for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right."

But though determined upon the righteousness of her course and upon the justice of her cause, America, roused to action has not rushed madly to war. Clear and unequivocal as was the President's address, ready as were the two houses of Congress to concur in his conclusions, the fateful resolutions which should formally announce hostilities were not crowded through Congress, although they were immediately introduced. Foreign affairs being the peculiar province of the upper Chamber, the House awaited the action of the senators. The Senate, under its rules, found it necessary to postpone discussion of the declaration from Tuesday, April 3, to 10 A. M. of Wednesday, April 4. Senator La Follette of Wisconsin refused to consent to the immediate consideration of the resolution reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations, Senator Stone alone opposing it in committee; and under the Senate rules, there was no option but to let the resolution lie until the following legislative day. The Senate, however, refused to consider any other question, adjourning to meet at 10 o'clock on Wednesday morning, and to remain in continuous session until a vote should be taken.

The session of Wednesday, April 4, was notable for the temper of the addresses made for and against the recognition of a state of war. Senator Stone declared that he feared that the proposed declaration of war was "the greatest national blunder in history," but he declared: "If we go into the war, then I shall cast all doubts and forebodings to the winds, and my eyes will be blind to everything but the flag of my country, borne by American boys through the storm of war." Senator McCumber proposed that Germany be given one more chance to give up her submarine warfare. Senator Vardaman said he did not condone the crimes of the German government against the people of the United States, and declared it as his opinion that if the question of peace or war were submitted to the people, they would direct the President to find some other way out. He said that he would vote against the resolution, but, once in the war, he would support the President.

Senator Lodge spoke at some length in support of the resolution. He declared his confidence in the loyalty of the overwhelming mass of our citizens of German descent, urged the seizure of German vessels in our ports, urged the elimination of partisanship on both sides in the Senate, declared for universal training and urged the sending abroad of at least a small force, "so that the flag of the United States might at least be unfurled on the fields of France." "I believe," he said, "the mere sight of that flag in that region made so desolate by war would stimulate the courage and help the success of those who have the same aim we have, and who seek the same victory." Senator Lodge urged especially that we should devote all of our resources and energies to the utmost to hasten complete victory, saying, "The worst of all wars is a feeble war."

Senator Hitchcock, in charge because of the opposition of Senator Stone, secured unanimous consent to the taking up of the resolution immediately on the convening of the Senate. Mr. Hitchcock has been a consistent opponent of war, even urging the President, after the special session had been called, to give armed neutrality a further trial. But he now announced that he had seen evidence that convinced him that armed neutrality was impracticable. Senator Hitchcock said: "The resolution provides for war against the Imperial German government. . . . It places responsibility for the war squarely upon the shoulders of the German government, charged with repeated acts of war against the United States. . . . I am impressed with the solemnity of the occasion. Some may be filled with joy at the prospect of war. To me it is depressing and dreadful. The enormous cost which the people must pay, the great increase in the cost of living, the enormous burden of taxes the people must bear, and the still greater heritage of death, stagger my mind. The awful sacrifice of lives that must follow sickens my heart. . . . We want no more territory. . . . We have no historic grudge to settle nor racial antipathy. . . . We, of all nations, will spend our treasure and our blood and sacrifice our lives without the thought of possibility of gain. We are going to war to vindicate our honor and independence as a great nation, and in defense of humanity.

"Such quarrel as we have with Germany is not of our choosing. It was forced upon us, and we did much to avoid it. . . . But one desperate act by the Imperial German government has followed another. . . . The Imperial German government has been desperate and has taken desperate chances."

Late in the afternoon Senator La Follette took the floor against the resolution, speaking for three hours. He said: "I had supposed until recently that it was the duty of senators and representatives to vote and act their convictions. Quite another doctrine has been proposed by the newspapers of the country. It is the doctrine of standing behind the President without inquiry as to whether he is right or wrong. I have stood behind him when I believed him right, and I shall continue to oppose him when I believe him wrong." Senator La Follette referred to the criticism which had been heaped upon him because of his attitude toward the arming of merchantmen, which he said he was convinced "would be wholly futile and a lure to their destruction."

U. S. marines, ready for anything as usual, going aboard ship at the League Island Navy Yard

He read a sheaf of telegrams reporting straw votes in various parts of the country, all of which opposed war, and he asked: "Will the supporters of this war bill have a vote upon it before it goes into effect? Unless they do that, it ill becomes us to speak of Germany. Submit this question to the people and by a vote of ten to one they will register their declaration against war." Making a plea for the people, the senator continued: "The poor, who are called to rot in the trenches, have now no organized mouthpiece. They have no press, but some time they will be heard, I hope in an orderly and peaceful way and before long. If we take this step, prices of necessaries will multiply and they will come to be taxed double again and again. The people will be heard; they will have their day."

The senator called attention to the fact that Germany's submarine pledges had been made conditional upon England being brought to obedience of international law, and declared: "It was England, not Germany, who refused to obey the declaration of London." He said further: "It is idle to talk of war on the German government and not on the German people. We are leagued, or are about to be, with the hereditary enemies of the German people." Senator La Follette declared that the great mistake of the Administration was in not protesting more vigorously against the British mine-field blockade, which mistake he felt was the real and primary cause of the American war declaration. He declared that we had wallowed in the mire at the feet of Great Britain and submitted in silence to her dictation, and because of that we had a legal and moral responsibility to Germany, and that in principle, therefore, Germany had the right to destroy blindly ships by submarines and mines in her own blockade zone; and he closed with the declaration that Germany had been patient with us, standing strictly on her rights to be accorded the same treatment as England by us.

SENATOR Williams of Mississippi arose immediately to reply to Senator La Follette. He said: "The speech of the Wisconsin senator would have become Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg. In fact, he has gone further than von Bethmann-Hollweg would ever have gone. Bethmann-Hollweg said that the submarine could be justified only on the grounds of necessity. The senator from Wisconsin puts it on the same footing as Great Britain's interference with our commerce. I fully expected the senator from Wisconsin, before he took his seat, to defend the invasion of Belgium." He declared that the senator from Wisconsin proved he did not know the difference between a prize court and a torpedo, and continued: "I am a little tired of utterances like that of the senator from Wisconsin. He endeavors to twist the British lion's tail. Demagogues have been doing that ever since the Revolution. Which would you rather do fight Germany now, with France and Great Britain and Russia, or fight her alone later? You have got to do one or the other. I tell you that if Germany does win that fight on the continent of Europe, she will begin building and getting ready to whip us unless the English fleet prevents it."

Continuing, Senator Williams said: "Let us see. Have we no honor? No regard for the future sovereignty of our country? No regard for our flag? Is sentiment rot? Is patriotism rot? Is there nothing precious except money? I am getting tired of this talk that this is a Wall Street war. That's a lie! Wall Street did not sink the Lusitania, the Arabic, the Sussex, and those other ships." Senator Williams said that the resolution did not propose that the United States enter the European War, but that it go into an American war to protect American rights, and for the sake of honor, justice, safety, liberty and equality. "Once at war," he continued, "the United States should stay until we become assured that the houses of Hohenzollern and Hapsburg no longer reign in Germany and Austria, and that the Turk will be forced back into Asia."

Senator Cummins, one of those who opposed the armed neutrality bill, said he desired to have a united nation, and therefore would vote for the resolution. He said: "Congress is now exercising its rightful constitutional function. Every loyal American will yield instant, undivided allegiance to its decree. There will be no division. I still believe there is another better course than the declaration of war. But I know, and every man knows, that war will be declared, and I intend to give evidence of unity among the people by subordinating my judgment to those of my fellows in Congress."

THE Senate finally reached a vote on the resolution at eleven minutes past eleven o'clock. There was no attempt to filibuster. The Senate voted solemnly in full knowledge of the portent of its action. The final vote was 82 to 6, Senators Lane, Stone and Vardaman, Democrats, and Senators Gronna, La Follette and Norris, Republicans, voting against the bill. The resolution, as finally passed, was as follows:

"Whereas, The Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America; therefore be it

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, which has thus been thrust upon the United States, is hereby formally declared; and

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination, all the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States."

THE House Foreign Relations Committee adopted the Senate form of resolution, reporting it favorably while the Senate debated. The resolution was made the order of business for April 5, the House adjourning to meet at 10 A. M. The nation's representatives began consideration of the war resolution promptly at the hour set. They met under an agreement to remain in session until the die had been cast, but there was no tendency to haste. Every man who desired to be heard was to be heard, and the action finally taken was to be the deliberate action of a free people.

It was known that there was opposition to the war resolution in the house, but few members were prepared for the appearance of Representative Claude Kitchin of North Carolina, Democratic floor leader, among the pleaders for peace. Mr. Kitchin and Mr. Cooper of Wisconsin made the principal arguments against the resolution, and Chairman Flood of the Foreign Affairs Committee and Mr. Mann of Illinois, Republican floor leader, made the major arguments for the action advised by the President.

Chairman Flood opened the debate, reciting one by one the German offenses against the United States, and demanded "the crushing of Prussian militarism and the liberation of the world from the menace of the Hohenzollern dynasty."

Mr. Kitchin said he had reached a decision to vote against the war resolution after prayer for guidance and with a full realization of the possible consequences to himself; but that he thought he should vote his convictions regardless of consequences. He said, in part:

"My friends, I cannot leave my children lands and riches. I cannot leave them fame. But I can leave them the name of an ancestor who, mattering not the consequences to himself, never hesitated to do his duty as God gave him to see it.

"Half the civilized world is now a slaughter-house for human beings. This nation is the last hope of peace on earth, good will toward men. . . . I am unwilling by my vote today for this nation to throw away the only remaining compass to which the world can look for guidance in the paths of right and truth and justice and humanity, and leave only force and blood to chart hereafter the path of mankind. . . . Mature thought and fervent prayer for rightful guidance have pointed out clearly the path of my duty, and I have made up my mind to walk in it, if I go barefooted and alone. . . . If I had a single doubt, I would dissolve it in favor of the view of the administration. . . . Why can we not, why should we not, forego the violation of our rights by Germany and do as we did with Mexico and Great Britain and thus save the universe from being wrapped in the flames of war?" Mr. Kitchin concluded with a pledge to merge his personal judgment into the will of the majority, once Congress had declared war.

Mr. Mann said: "I wish to pay a tribute to the courage of those members of the House, who, in the exercise of the responsibility cast upon them, have expressed their opposition to this resolution. . . . I do not agree with them. . . . For two years and a half I have done all in my power to keep this country out of the European war. I have believed that it was to the advantage of our people and our country, to the advantage of civilization and humanity, that we should keep out of the war at this time. But after all it was not because I was afraid of war. The American people may prefer peace, but they are not guilty of cowardice. . . . Now the situation is changed. The President of the United States has asked us to declare war. . . . The only thing left for us to do is to stand by the President, elected by the people. We cannot say to the world that our only goal is gold, that our only desire is wealth. We must declare that we will maintain the rights of Americans abroad as well as at home. . . . There is a difference between a deliberate affront and an incidental injury. We have had incidental injuries from both England and Germany. Now we are compelled to say that a deliberate affront has been made by Germany, and there is nothing left for us to do but follow the recommendation of our chief executive and engage in war and maintain our rights and our civilization."

Attempts failed to amend the resolution to provide that no American troops should be sent out of the country except by the authorization of Congress, and to provide that no troops should be sent except such as should volunteer for foreign service.

THE vote was reached early Friday morning and the resolution was passed at 3:15 A. M. by a vote of 373 to 50.

The resolution was a "joint" resolution. If it had been a "concurrent" resolution its passage by the House would have stood immediately as a declaration of war; but being a "joint" resolution it was necessary for it to be returned to the Senate to be engrossed, then signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and sent to the President for his signature. With the President's signiture affixed, and it was expected that he would sign it during the day of April 6, the resolution became a law, and the American nation was once more at war.

The War Resolution Signed

THE war resolution passed by Congress at three o'clock on Friday morning was immediately signed by Speaker Clark. It was then held in the custody of the clerk of the House until the Senate convened at noon when it was presented to that body and signed at 12:14 o'clock by Vice-President Marshall. Then the bearers of this important document hurried into the executive offices where it was signed by the President at 1:18 o'clock on April 6. From that minute the government and people of the United States were officially at war with the Imperial German government. The news was wigwagged by an officer of the navy from the executive offices to another officer at the Navy Building, and at once the wireless and land wires carrried to every ship of the navy and every naval station and army barracks under the Stars and Stripes a message which read, "The President has signed an act of Congress which declares that a state of war exists between the United States and Germany." Immediately after signing the resolution declaring war, the President signed the proclamation which appears on this page.

In accordance with orders previously sent from Washington, the customs authorities, on the passage of the war resolution in the House, immediately seized 91 German ships which had taken refuge in American ports, the action being described officially as a measure of "protection" for the ships themselves. It is expected, however, that the ships, which had been more or less damaged by their crews, will be repaired and used as naval auxiliaries or as merchant ships, being operated by the Shipping Board, although the use of the vessels in this manner requires an act of Congress. The 91 ships seized have a total tonnage of 629,000 gross tons, about as much as could be built in American yards in a year. The value of the vessels at cost is considerably over $100,000,000, although their present value is several times that. The largest vessel is the great Vaterland, with a tonnage of 54,282; the next largest is the George Washington with a tonnage of 25,570. The fourteen largest vessels furnish transport facilities for 40,000 troops in one trip at a speed of 14 knots, and they will probably be so used in case an American army is sent abroad.

The American secret service caused the arrest on April 6 of 60 alleged ringleaders in German plots and conspiracies in different parts of the United States. The men arrested were said to be of three classes: those convicted of violating American neutrality and at liberty under bond; those indicted by federal grand jury for similar offenses and at liberty under bond, awaiting trial; and persons neither indicted nor convicted, whose activities have been under surveillance. The names of those arrested were not made public, and it was announced that bail would be refused in each case.

The President of the United States

LATIN AMERICA AND THE WAR. On April 6 President Menocal of Cuba sent a message to the Cuban congress asking permission to declare war, declaring that the debt Cuba owes to the United States, as well as the principles of justice and humanity, demanded that such action be taken. An extraordinary session of the Cuban congress was called for April 7, which passed unanimously and with wild enthusiasm a bill declaring Cuba at war with Germay. It was also proposed that the Republic of Cuba place a Cuban army of 10,000 at the disposition of the War Department of the United States of America. It was also expected that Cuba would seize German ships lying in her harbors. Brazil is also aroused by the sinking of the 4,461-ton steamship Parana near Cherbourg with a loss of three of her crew. The Parana was torpedoed without warning. The council of ministers of Brazil was called to meet on April 7 and there was every appearance that Brazil would promptly break with Germany. The republic of Panama also joined the United States in the war on April 7, and opinion in Latin America appeared to be fast crystallizing into decisions for similar action, especially in Guatemala and Chile.

AN AMERICAN PORT IN FRANCE. The French government took preliminary steps on April 5 for the setting aside of the French port of Brest for use by the American navy as a base in European waters. It was announced also at Washington on April 6 that the naval vessels of the Entente Allies would now be permitted to enter and leave American ports at will and to take on provisions and to give their officers and men shore leave, although the principal object of the Allied patrol off our coast is removed by the seizure of the German vessels.

U-BOATS REPORTED NEAR OUR COASTS. Persistent but unconfirmed reports indicate that a number of German submarines are waiting in the Gulf of Mexico for the declaration of war. Submarines were also reported in the neighborhood of Porto Rico on April 6, and warnings were sent out by wireless to all vessels to take precautions. There is some evidence that a submarine base has been established on the Mexican coast. The official attitude of Mexico toward the American-German situation had not been definitely declared on April 7. Press dispatches from Mexico indicated that Mexican public opinion was turning to the support of the United States.

The President's Proclamation of a State of War

A Proclamation

WHEREAS, the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of the constitutional authority vested in them, have resolved by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, bearing date this day, "that a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared;"

Whereas, it is provided by Section 4,067 of the Revised Statutes as follows:

"Whenever there is declared a war between the United States and any foreign nation or Government or any invasion or predatory incursion is perpetrated, attempted, or threatened against the territory of the United States by any foreign nation or Government, and the President makes public proclamation of the event, all native citizens, denizens, or subjects of a hostile nation or Government being male of the age of 14 years and upward, who shall be within the United States and not actually naturalized, shall be liable to be apprehended, restrained, secured, and removed as alien enemies. The President is authorized in any such event by his proclamation thereof, or other public acts, to direct the conduct to be observed on the part of the United States toward the aliens who become so liable; the manner and degree of the restraint to which they shall be subject and in what cases and upon what security their residence shall be permitted, and to provide for the removal of those who, not being permitted to reside within the United States, refuse or neglect to depart therefrom; and to establish any such regulations which are found necessary in the premises and for the public safety."

Whereas, by Sections 4,068, 4,069, and 4,070 of the Revised Statutes, further provision is made relative to alien enemies;

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim, to all whom it may concern, that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government, and I do specially direct all officers, civil or military, of the United States that they exercise vigilance and zeal in the discharge of the duties incident to such a state of war, and I do, moreover, earnestly appeal to all American citizens that they, in loyal devotion to their country, dedicated from its foundation to the principles of liberty and justice, uphold the laws of the land, and give undivided and willing support to those measures which may be adopted by the constitutional authorities in prosecuting the war to a successful issue and in obtaining a secure and just peace;

And, acting under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the said sections of the Revised Statutes,

I do hereby further proclaim and direct that the conduct to be observed on the part of the United States toward all natives, citizens, denizens, or subjects of Germany, being male of the age of 14 years and upward, who shall be within the United States and not actually naturalized, who for the purpose of this proclamation and under such sections of the Revised Statutes are termed alien enemies, shall be as follows:

All alien enemies are enjoined to preserve the peace toward the United States and to refrain from crime against the public safety and from violating the laws of the United States and of the States and Territories thereof, and to refrain from actual hositility or giving information, aid, or comfort to the enemies of the United States and to comply strictly with the regulations which are hereby, or which may be from time to time, promulgated by the President, and so long as they shall conduct themselves in accordance with law they shall be undisturbed in the peaceful pursuit of their lives and occupations, and be accorded the consideration due to all peaceful and law-abiding persons, except so far as restrictions may be necessary for their own protection and for the safety of the United States, and toward such alien enemies as conduct themselves in accordance with law all citizens of the United States are enjoined to preserve the peace and to treat them with all such friendliness as may be compatible with loyalty and allegiance to the United States.

And all alien enemies who fail to conduct themselves as so enjoined, in addition to all other penalties prescribed by law, shall be liable to restraint or to give security or to remove and depart from the United States, in the manner prescribed by Sections 4,069 and 4,070 of the Revised Statues and as prescribed in the regulations duly promulgated by the President.

And pursuant to the authority vested in me, I hereby declare and establish the following regulations, which I find necessary in the premises and for the public safety:

1. An alien enemy shall not have in his possession at any time or place any firearms, weapons, or implements of war, or component parts thereof, ammunition, Maxim or other silencer, arms, or explosives or material used in the manufacture of explosives;

2. An alien enemy shall not have in his possession at any time or place, or use or operate, any aircraft or wireless apparatus, or any form of signaling device or any form of cipher code or any paper, document, or book written or printed in cipher or in which there may be invisible writing;

3. All property found in the possession of an alien enemy in violation of the foregoing regulations shall be subject to seizure by the United States;

4. An alien enemy shall not approach or be found within one half af a mile of any Federal or State fort, camp, arsenal, aircraft station, Government or naval vessel, navy yard, factory, or workshop for the manufacture of munitions of war or of any products for the use of the army or navy;

An alien enemy shall not write, print, or publish any attack or threat against the Government or Congress of the United States, or either branch thereof, or against the measures or policy of the United States, or against the persons or property of any person in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, or of the States or Territories, or of the District of Columbia, or of the municipal governments therein;

6. An alien enemy shall not commit or abet any hostile acts against the United States or give information, aid, or comfort to its enemies;

7. An alien enemy shall not reside in or continue to reside in, to remain in, or enter any locality which the President may from time to time designate by an Executive order as a prohibitive area, in which residence by an alien enemy shall be found by him to constitute a danger to the public peace and safety of the United States, except by permit from the President and except under such limitations or restrictions as the President may prescribe;

8. An alien enemy whom the President shall have reasonable cause to believe to be aiding or about to aid the enemy or to be at large to the danger of the public peace or safety of the United States, or to have violated or to be about to violate any of these regulations, shall remove to any location designated by the President by Executive order, and shall not remove therefrom without permit, or shall depart from the United States if so required by the President;

This proclamation and the regulations herein contained shall extend and apply to all land and water, continental or insular, in any way within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The Nation Bends Its Bow. The time between the President's call for the extra session and the actual declaration of war was fully used by the various departments at Washington in preparing for the action that should follow the declaration. It was announced on April 3 that the American, British and French navies would cooperate in dealing with the German submarine menace, and in other naval operations, as soon as Congress passed the resolution authorizing the use of the military and naval forces of the United States against Germany. The War Department also planned for the raising of an army, the plan being to enlist the regular army to its full war strength of 280,000 men, to enlist the National Guard similarly to a strength of 440,000, and to raise an army of 500,000 more by selective drafting under a law providing for universal service. This, with a second 500,000 to be drafted later, would give an army of approximately 1,720,000. It was said that it would take about four months to do the work of registration on which universal military service would be based. At the time of the declaration of war the enlisted strength of the National Guard was 160,000, of whom about 55,000 were then in the Federal service; the strength of the regular army was about 125,000 men and the strength of the navy was nearly 87,000, with nearly 18,000 in the marine corps. Active steps were taken for the organization of a coast patrol of submarine chasers. This branch of the service will be under the command of Captain Henry B. Wilson, U. S. N., who has been detached from the command of the superdreadnought Pennsylvania to take charge of the coast "mosquito fleet." Official estimates of money credits which the government will need place the cost of the first year's war at $3,401,865,684. The President is known to favor the raising of most of this money by means of increased taxes, although the exact nature of such taxes cannot be forecasted.

Submarine Sinks Armed American Ship. The American steamer Aztec, armed for defense against submarines, was torpedoed by a submarine and sunk on the night of April 1 close to France. The survivors were brought into the port of Brest. The naval gun crew was saved, but 28 men were reported missing from the crew. The submarine was not sighted. The American armed liner St. Paul was reported on April 3 as having arrived safely at a British port.

America Welcomed as an Ally. The report of the President's speech in Congress on April 2 was received in the British House of Commons with cheers and applause, but the Parliament was about to rise for the Easter recess, and it was not expected that the passage of the resolution in the Congress at Washington declaring war against Germany would be consummated in time for the British Parliament to pass a formal resolution of welcome for the new ally. M. Jules Cambon declared America's entry into the war the greatest event since the Civil War, and Premier Ribot is reported to have said: "It is a red-letter day for us. This is a memorable day in the history of the world." In Paris the American flag was immediately displayed with the colors of the other Allies on receipt of news of the President's message. It was reported that the British and French air service scattered thousands of German translations of the message inside the German lines. German opinion is expressed by one correspondent as follows: "Nobody is excited here, but nobody is underestimating the effect of America's entrance into the war against Germany. In military circles it is considered that the immediate effect on the various fighting fronts will not be considerable. In political circles what is most feared is that America's action may influence the present rulers of Russia to a degree that they will resist the temptation to accept the peace offered by Germany." The Berlin Tageblatt is reported to have said: "We realize now what a big mistake it was that German policy saw fit to refuse to conclude the Bryan peace treaty with the United States."

Mobilizing Women. It was reported on March 31 that a careful estimate showed that war would leave vacant 100,000 office jobs in New York City, but that adequate preparation had been made to fill the places of these men with women so rapidly and effectively that business would continue without disturbance.

Freedom is Russia's Faith. The provisional government in Russia on April 4 repealed all laws limiting the rights of Russian citizens regarding creeds and religions. This means an end of Jewish oppression. It was announced also that women would be allowed to vote in the elections to the Constituent Assembly. A few days earlier the Russian government issued a proclamation announcing the government's wish that Poland decide for itself the form of government it desires, the announcement being that the government takes it for granted that the decision will be for a new independent Poland formed of all the three now separate parts.

Sweden Still Neutral. After nearly a month's crisis, Carl Schwartz, as premier, succeeded in organizing a new parliament in Sweden on March 31. The cabinet is reported as German in sympathy. One of the first announcements of the new premier was that Sweden would continue to follow faithfully the sound policy of impartial neutrality.

Fragments of News. The special border work of the Y. M. C. A. was brought to an end by the withdrawal of the National Guard troops before mustering out, but it was announced that the Y. M. C. A. was ready for instant action in all camps where National Guardsmen or volunteer troops might be mobilized following the declaration of war. In the border work, a total attendance of 7,871,468 has been registered at the different buildings. Over 5,000,000 letters have been written on stationery furnished; 681,407 men have attended the religious meetings, 13,845 men had decided for the Christian life, while 2,242 more renewed their Christian purpose. There were distributed 45,470 copies of the Scriptures. . . . The Federal Express between Boston and Washington used the new Hell Gate bridge for the first time in regular service on April 1. . . . The Illinois legislature on March 28 killed the statewide prohibition referendum bill, the district local option bill, and the bone-dry anti-shipping bill, and even refused to create a dry zone around the Dixon Epileptic Colony. Some of the people of Illinois had a chance to express themselves on April 3, with the result that the state capital was voted dry by a majority of 770, the issue being decided by the votes of the women, while five other townships in the state also went dry, and only one dry town returned to the wet column. . . . An executive order issued on March 31 placed all postmasters of the first, second and third class, in number about 10,000, under the civil service rules, completing the work begun by President Taft, who took the fourth class offices out of politics. Hereafter all postmasterships will be filled by competitive examinations, but present incumbents will be continued without examination while they render good service. . . . It was announced early in April that as a result of negotiations between the National Defense Council and steel manufacturers, a price had been agreed upon for government steel at slightly more than three cents a pound, or about $68 a long ton, which is about half the present market price. It was announced also that all government orders were being rushed although the mills needed more labor. . . . Brand Whitlock, American Minister to Belgium, reached Berne, Switzerland, on April 3. The Belgians were said to have been in tears when Whitlock left. . . . Gold reserves held by the United States reserve bank system were reported on March 31 to have reached $938,000,000, an increase of $200,000,000 since January 1. The comparison of the economic wealth concerned in the present world war made by the National City bank shows the economic wealth of the Central Powers as $113,000,000,000, the economic wealth of the Allies as $215,000,000,000, and the economic wealth of the United States as $200,000,000,000. Great Britain with an economic wealth of $85,000,000,000 is shown to have borrowed $19,000,000,000. France with a wealth of $55,000,000,000 has borrowed $9,500,000,000, Russia with $50,000,000,000 of wealth has borrowed $10,000,000,000. Italy with $25,000,000,000 has borrowed $2,600,000,000. The present bonded debt of the United States is $983,000,000. . . . An American cruiser on April 1 captured five of the leaders of the Cuban rebellion who were nearing the coast of Haiti in a schooner. The men were held for extradition to Cuba.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

On the northern half of the Arras-Craonne sector of the western line, during almost the whole of the week ending April 7, the British continued to add to the territory they occupied. On Friday, March 30, they captured the three villages of Ruyaulcourt, Sorel-le-Grand and Fins, which hamlets are located between Bertincourt and Roisel, and therefore in the center of the British line. The effect of these captures was to straighten this line between the two last-mentioned places. The same day a warm but indecisive fight took place south of Neuville-Bourjonval, toward Arras, and on Sunday other villages in the center of the line were taken by the British, namely Vendelle, Reiziere and Epehy.

Farther south, near St. Quentin, the British took the village of Savy and the wood of the same name, which captures were important in that they placed the British squarely in front of the German lines defending St. Quentin. The next day the British took the three villages of Francilly, Seleney and Holnon, which hamlets form a small triangle immediately east of St. Quentin and just north of Savy, mentioned above. Law and Liberty

SUNDAY, April 22. Ps. 119 : 45. "I will walk at liberty because I seek thy precepts." Here is liberty found in the domain of law. The psalmist passes into certain limitations and discovers a larger world. That is a sequence which is incredible to the worldling, but it is quite well known to the saint. The man of the world reasons that when he passes under law he enters into bondage. He imagines that when he is a law unto himself, that is to say, when he recognizes no law at all, he enjoys a boundless circuit of freedom. On the other hand, the psalmist declares that to be under no restraint is to suffer the severest of restrictions, and that to welcome the yoke of God's commandments is to walk in the largest liberty.

Now there is no realm where the lawless are the free. In whatever way we wish to go we must accept bondage if we would discover liberty. A musician must reverence the laws of harmony if he would exult in his lovely world. A builder must put himself in bondage to the law of gravity, or it is not a house which emerges but a rubbish-heap. What sort of liberty does a man enjoy who consistently defies the laws of health? In all these realms to trespass is to be maimed, to pay homage is to be free.

But the principle has its supreme application in the realm of the spirit. When a man disregards the law of the Lord it may seem as though he has an unfenced world to walk in. Can he not do what he likes? Can he not go where he likes? There are no locks, no gates, no walls. The universe is his parish. And on the other hand it may seem that the man who accepts the restraints of the commandment of the Lord has only a park for his province, and not the bountiful freedom of the entire countryside. But all this is only in seeming; it is not the transcript of experience.

What has experience to tell us? Which of the two walks in liberty—the miser who defies the law of humanity, or the benefactor who honors the law with all his heart, and mind, and strength? Which man is really free—the man who moves in falsehood, or the man who rejoices in the truth? Which of the two looks as if he had the privileges of a boundless inheritance—the cynic or the lover? Experience has no hesitancy in her reply. It is the slave who is really free: it is the law-bound who have perfect liberty.

And now I can see how the apostle Paul can in one breath speak of being "called unto freedom," and in the next breath glory in being "the bond-slave of Christ Jesus." He has found his rest in wearing a yoke. He has subjected his will to Another, and the submission has given him access into "the glorious liberty of the children of God." J. H. J.

Life's Vigilant Angel, Fear

MONDAY, April 23. Ps. 111 : 10. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth forever." The function of fear in life is most useful. It is, in the realm of morals, what pain is in the realm of the physical. Pain is a sentinel. He who planned these wonderful bodies of ours stationed at innumerable outposts faithful, watchful, sleepless sentinel nerves. And yet there are no nerves of pain. There are nerves of sensation, and the selfsame nerves which bring us pain bring us pleasure as well. Fear, like pain, is benevolent, if it be the right kind of fear. There are things we must be afraid of if we would keep our souls from harm. Paul was a brave man, yet he was always afraid lest, having saved others, he might himself be a castaway. Fear of the right sort has cured many a heart of ignoble fear. It was said of a certain man, "He feared God and naught else." The fear of God logically implies all these: the imperceptible approach of evil; the loss, by moral leakage, of resisting power; the weakening by indulgence of imagination or desire, of those moral qualities which are the entrenchments of the soul, and the loosening of our spiritual anchorages by compromise with the debased ideals of our time or of our neighborhood or of our social set. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." What is the end of wisdom? "To fear God and keep his commandments." "This is the whole man." "The whole man" is the holy man. So, fear of God is close akin to holiness. C. C. A.

Lessons in Nature

TUESDAY, April 24. Prov. 30 : 24–28. "There be four things which are little upon the earth, but they are exceeding wise: the ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer; the conies are but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks; the locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands; the spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in king's palaces." There are unwritten laws governing the actions of irrational creatures that engage the study of the wisest. An open-eyed and patient observer of the dumb brutes, a lover of nature who views with sympathetic interest the myriad forms of life in field and forest, not only gathers a fine store of materials for interesting stories, but if he reflects on and inwardly digests his observations he is taught many a fine moral lesson.

The old church fathers in the Middle Ages who found in the passage before us an image of the Church of God on earth were not far from the mark. Amid the imperial institutions of the political, commercial, social, and literary world the Church of God looks like a feeble organization that is just suffered to exist by the forbearance of the mighty ones of this earth. But in their simplicity, weakness, lowliness and isolation its members are known to practice a spiritual foresight, secure themselves in impregnable positions in the eternal mountains of God's truth, act in cooperation under wise leadership, and enter into the most exalted stations on earth, which excites the wonder of historians and philosophers.

Nature is an excellent record of God's wisdom, power, and goodness, and deserves to be studied for its own sake. No study of it is barren of results. One day in the woods may prove a revelation. But the study of nature is enhanced a hundredfold to us when from its physical aspects we are led to eminent spiritual principles. W. H. T. D.

Jesus in the Home

WEDNESDAY, April 25. John 12 : 1, 2. "Then Jesus came to Bethany, where Lazarus was, and they made him a supper." Bethany was one of the temporary homes of Our Lord. He really had nowhere of his own to lay his head. At Bethany he was welcome. Lazarus adored him. The sisters delighted to minister unto his weariness, hunger and social needs. What pleasing conversations must have been enjoyed around the frugal board and family fireside! What rest to the toiling Traveler who had given his sympathy and blessing to multitudes on that day! In this home Jesus was the Son of Man among congenial spirits, finding companionship instead of loneliness, appreciation instead of abuse, kindness rather than the malignant hatred of many whom he came to save.

The worshipful adoration of Mary, the sweet hospitality of the hard-worked Martha, together with the fellowship of Lazarus, made that home a heaven on earth. Martha was a little reproved for chiding Mary, because the life is more than meat and the body than raiment; but, after all, how useful and needful is the work of caring for the body, the citadel of the soul! Mary, knowing that Jesus would not long be with them, sought to feed the soul first, the better part that could not be taken from her.

This was Our Lord's last week before the crucifixion. Though Mary did not realize this, while Martha was serving and Lazarus conversing, she anointed Jesus with the costly ointment for his burial. What a beautiful inscription Jesus wrote on her monumental character! "She hath done what she could." Every home may be beautiful with Christ in the midst.

The Great Mystery

THURSDAY, April 26. I. Tim. 3 : 16. "Without doubt, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh; justified in the Spirit; seen of angels; preached unto the Gentiles; believed on in the world; receïved up to glory." A mystery is not necessarily a thing unknown, much less a thing unknowable, rather it is a thing which has a meaning that does not appear upon the surface, a meaning which must be searched for. In the language of the Scriptures, a mystery is something which the sense and reason, untaught, may not be able to discover; something which, to be known, must first be revealed to us.

The mysteriousness of many elements in the Gospel of Jesus Christ is presumptive evidence of its superhuman origin. A merely human religion need have no mystery in it. God has put many a truth into the form of a mystery in order to awaken our sluggish minds and to evoke the resolute effort of our wills. The mysteries of godliness are worthy their divine Author. The fatal weakness of Spiritism, with its abundant offers of communications from the spirit world, is that, thus far, none of these communications is of any consequence. A superhuman mystery must not be obvious, ordinary. When God speaks, his words concern the vital issues of our lives. The mystery of godliness as revealed in the Holy Scriptures concerns the great problems which, unsolved, haunt our midnight pillows.

The Christian mysteries, as outlined in these words, all concern Christ. Can we not get away from him? Never, so long as we have faith in the Bible. Christ is in Genesis and Revelation, in the Law and the Prophets, in the Psalms and the Books of Wisdom. We can not escape him. His is the face which looks out from all pictures, his the eyes which gaze upon us from every wall, his the figure standing within every shadow. We must know this, that God never reveals himself to any man except by his Eternal Son. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." If any radiant soul outside of Christendom has ever known God, and there have been such souls, the channel of that revelation has been none other than Christ, for he is the Eternal Word. C. C. A.

Freedom to Serve

FRIDAY, April 27. II Cor. 3 : 17. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." One of the epochal writings of Luther which reveals the spirit of the whole reformatory movement is "The Freedom of a Christian Man." In this treatise Luther propounds the following paradox: 1. The Christian is a free lord over all things and subject to no one except God. 2. The Christian is a humble and willing servant of everybody.

Christianity represents the highest type of liberty to which man can attain. It sets the noblest powers of the mind of man, his intellect and will, his moral and spiritual forces, which had been kept in bondage under inherited guilt and depravity, free to exert themselves to the limit of their capacity, restrained only by the revealed will of God.

The greatest public exhibition of this freedom was in the life of Jesus Christ. He was conscious of his divine majesty and his sovereign right to rule the created universe at his pleasure. He was Lord also of the law. And yet he bowed to the law in his personal relations to God and to men. He expounded the meaning of the divine law as no teacher in Israel had done before him. His life was a life of self-imposed servitude within the scope of the holy law of God.

No service which that law demanded of its true observers seemed too humiliating to him; he gladly rendered the service required. It was all done in the most lordly and generous fashion. It was the service of a free man, not of a bondslave. It was rendered with the air of one who is enjoying the free exercise of a splendid privilege, not with the grouchy and morose sullenness of the peon who is lashed to his task. That is the very soul of Christianity; freedom in the midst of bondage, self-assumed servitude rendered in the spirit of a prince. W. H. T. D.

A "Must" in Every Life

SATURDAY, April 28. Acts 19 : 21. "I must see Rome." Paul said to the Ephesian elders that he must go to Jerusalem, notwithstanding the dangers that seemed to threaten him, and added, "I must also see Rome." He never took back his words to Jesus, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" The pathway of his life was ever made plain to him by angelic messengers and the influence of the Holy Spirit. He could ever say, "I come to do thy will, O God!" His divine call to Rome came seven years before he was privileged to enter the city. It was the call of God, not of a church. There were no salary or promises mentioned except that, in every city, bonds and afflictions awaited him. It made no difference to the heroic apostle that he went as a prisoner to the prisons in Rome. He was willing to stand between the spears of paganism and the jeers of Judaism, if he could preach the Gospel in Rome also.

When he appealed unto Cæsar, Rome was compelled to pay his moving expenses. After many perils, his longing eyes beheld the central city of the world. He had believed God, and now his promise was verified.

Every faithful Christian feels this "must" in his life. It is the voice of duty, the call of God, indicating the divine plan in one's destiny. It is not a sudden impulse or a fleeting imagination, but the conscious certainty of heavenly guidance.

Under this influence, Paul said to the imperiled passengers, "Do not jump overboard; abide in the ship, and you will be saved; for I must see Rome." Paul's Epistles written in the Roman prison have influenced the world for many centuries in the past and will reach out into the most distant future. Rome became the apostle's Calvary, from whence he ascended to his crown of glory. E. W. C.

A Heart-Stirring Message

IN his epoch-making message to the War Congress, President Wilson looks far beyond immediate results to be achieved. He opens up to this nation the vision of a wide-reaching world democracy. That the President keeps in touch with his ideal is made evident in this eloquent closing passage of his message: "There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes."

These are thoughts to stir the souls of men, and especially of Americans. On every side there are indications that "the old order" is changing throughout the world, and that the rule of the people is unmistakably asserting itself. We have seen monarchs flee from their palaces and go out to exile. Thrones are tottering wherever enlightenment has come. The voice of the people is rising in the demand for greater freedom. A new world will rise after this war from the ruins of the old—a world in which human freedom, international peace and goodwill shall more largely, if not universally, prevail than ever before.

That this is the hope and the farther look which largely inspired the message, is also made clear in the passage in which the President refers to Russia's revolution, which he regards as mightily adding "to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice and for peace."

Now that the decision has been made, and that Congress has spoken, the course to be followed by the government should receive the loyal support of every good citizen. All differences of opinion are now things of the past. We face the future a united people, confident in the statesmanship and devotion of the nation's leaders. There should now be no factionists, no divisions of any kind—all should be Americans, loyal and true to the government, and to the highest interests of the nation.

Conscription of Incomes

JUST and farsighted is the President's demand that, from the very first, the expenses of the war be met so far as possible by taxation rather than bond issues.

The financial burden is one of the gravest elements in modern warfare. England alone is spending thirty-five million dollars a day as her share of the war cost. The British exchequer has just reported for the last year a deficit of eight billions. These are astounding figures, but they are hard facts; and the United States must not falsely hope to escape its tremendous share of the cash cost of war.

It is most important that, from the very first to the very last, the larger portion of the war expense shall be borne by those best able to bear it. The proposed increase in the income tax is a direct and just method.

The young men who enlist or are conscripted will be compelled to give up their present incomes, to cease providing for their families, and to offer even their lives for their country. Property must not be held more sacred than life. It must be conscripted too.

The cost of the war, to the last dollar, is a responsibility for the present generation to bear. We cannot honorably escape. This burden must be borne by the men and women of today. It must not be bonded and thus handed down upon the next generation as a debt to be wrung from the orphans of the brave men who now give their lives.

A Baby Between the Trenches

A DAY was dawning on a battlefield in northern France through a fog so thick that none could see more than a few yards from the trenches. In the night the Germans had drawn back their lines a little and the French had closely advanced, but between the two positions a lone farmhouse was still standing. As the sun rose and the fog cleared and the gunners found their ranges, heavy guns began to boom and answer back. Thus began again the old, old, wearisome story of day after day of desolation and death.

But suddenly on both sides the firing ceased and there fell a peculiar dead stillness. Midway between the trenches, near the now shattered farmhouse, there was—no, it must be impossible, it must be a delusion! But no—there in the green meadow, crawling on its hands and knees, was a little child, a mere baby. It appeared perfectly happy and contented, and in the sudden dumbness of the soldiers the baby's laugh was heard as it clutched at a dandelion. Not a sound was to be heard but that; not a shot was fired; scarcely did a soldier on either side dare breathe.

Never was there a surer truce on any battlefield. For many moments the grim lines of veterans waited and listened to the happy babblings of the babe they had rendered homeless and orphaned. This spot, which had been a veritable inferno of shot and shell, was now like some peaceful island or a cool, friendly oasis in a burning desert.

Suddenly a soldier jumped out of a German trench and ran to where the child was crawling. He tenderly took it up and carried it back to shelter. From the trenches of the French there came no shots, but there rang along both lines a mighty cheer.

But soon—alas—the guns were booming again and answering back, and the flowering bit of meadow was plowed by shells; for hate is hate and war is war, and men to be fit to fight must not long yield to pity for the countless orphans that the brave battling makes.

Paul Revere's Horse

PAUL REVERE'S name is immortal. Ever since that far-away April midnight when he rode from Boston to Lexington and Concord, warning the patriots along the way of the British approach, his fame has been securely enshrined in the hearts of all Americans.

Historians have honored themselves in honoring him. Poets have found inspiration in praising him. He is an idol of childhood, an example in the prime of manhood, and a solacing memory of old age.

How few characters loom up like great peaks above the mountain ranges of time!

And Paul Revere was one of these. He was one of the precious few great enough to grasp an opportunity to do an incalculable good to mankind.

But while we give deserved glory to Paul Revere, let us no longer forget that there was another hero in that wild midnight ride.

There was the horse.

"Any other horse might have done as well"—you think? Well, so might any other man have done as well, perhaps. So might we flippantly disparage any hero.

But the fact remains that it was Paul Revere and Paul Revere's horse that did it. And the harder work fell on the horse. But for the true horse's faithfulness, Paul Revere would have been a failure.

See what the poet says:

"A hurry of hoofs in a village street,
A shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark,
And beneath, from the pebbles, in passing, a spark
Struck out by a steed flying fearless and fleet.

That was all, and yet, through the gloom and the light,
The fate of a nation was riding that night;
And the spark struck out by that steed in his flight
Kindled the land into flame with its heat."

We need tear no garlands from the head of Paul Revere to put a wreath on the neck of his noble horse. There ought to be enough flowers of gratitude in the American hearts for both.

It would be interesting to have a history from the horse viewpoint of the great tourneys and battles and rides of the world's heroes.

The Skeleton of Life

LUCK and fate form the bare skeleton upon which each man builds his life. The result depends upon the spirit, motives and efforts with which he grows flesh and blood and nerves upon this skeleton.

The Scotch have a story of a boating party that was caught out in a storm. "Let us pray," suggested some one. "Ay," cried the boatman; "we are an oar short; let the little mon over there do nothing but pray, but let all the strong men take an oar and row as they pray."

There is no impiety in this. Prayer cannot bring strength or succor to those who do not use the strength and means at hand.

Fate is treacherous and soonest betrays those who depend most upon it. It helps only those determined to help themselves by acting out their desires. Luck, too, is faithless and laughs at the man who too strongly puts his trust in it. It generously spreads a golden glow upon the achievements of the man who rows as he prays, but for the man who does not strive it has only mockery.

There is no worse belief than that in fate and luck to make one a failure. It puts one in a wholly wrong attitude toward life. It deadens incentive and power to employ one's own resources. It destroys fixed and wholesome aspirations. It paralyzes the energies and the resolves. It renders organized and spirited effort impossible.

We may hope for no luck that we are not worthy of and are not doing our own part to earn.

The Greatness of America

IT will be good news to our readers that Mr. Frank G. Carpenter, whose letters of travel in Alaska were received with such wide appreciation in the Christian Herald during the past year, is preparing a new and very remarkable series of travel articles on "The Greater United States, or Our New Industrial Empire."

This series, which will shortly begin in the Christian Herald, will be on-the-spot studies of our farms, factories, mines and other industrial resources, which have made the United States the richest country in the world. Mr. Carpenter writes: "Our wealth today is $220,000,000,000. Every branch of industry has on its seven-league boots, wages are at their maximum, and prices are kissing the skies. The aim of these travels is to learn just what we have in resources and industry, and how they may be protected, developed and made most efficient for our whole people."

Every American should know all that is worth knowing about our native land, and here is an opportunity for the readers of the Christian Herald to inform themselves accurately through the entertaining and instructive letters of this talented traveler. A tour with Frank Carpenter is the best kind of substitute for an expensive and prolonged trip, with the additional advantage that you can learn more with him as your companion than under any other arrangement we know of. These letters will give a good opportunity to all who read them to "see America first."

The Jewish Opportunity

THIS is the day of opportunity for the Jew. All of the ancient race have their eyes turned toward Jerusalem. The hope of the ages is rekindling in their breasts. Is it to be the mission of the Jews to help the rest of the world toward the realization of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God? It would be the greatest of all missions—the grandest task ever laid upon any race.

But the day of opportunity may be clouded, should the Jews still remain indifferent to the great historical fact that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was himself a Jew; all of his apostles, including the evangelists and Peter and Paul, were of that race. The foundations of Christianity were laid by men of Jewish birth and parentage.

They were Jews who had seen a great light. In Jesus they recognized the Messiah, the Saviour of the world. The first Christian church of 120 souls was composed of Jewish men and women who had been won to the new faith, which was revealed first to the Jews. The New Testament, the universally accepted basis of the Christian religion, was written by Jews. So also with the Old Testament, in which the Hebrew prophets foreshadowed the Messiah.

More than in any of the centuries that have passed, the Jew today is beginning to realize the greatness of the Man of Nazareth. Many intellectual Hebrews no longer hesitate to recognize the supreme value of his teaching. The time is coming, and may be very near, when Jesus will be the glory of the Jew, as he is today of over 550,000,000 of non-Jews throughout the world, and when the sons and daughters of Israel will speak of him as the Messiah, and the Divine Redeemer of their race. Many thousands of Jews sincerely believe in him today.

The greatest barrier to the spiritual enlightenment of the Jews has been the intolerance and persecution they have received at the hands of so-called Christian nations. That barrier is breaking down, and must soon crumble to pieces. Then, when the Jews are no longer discriminated against, but are accorded everywhere the same rights and privileges that others enjoy, their religious and social ostracism will be ended. The way will then be open for the ancient race to enter into the great spiritual and social privileges that await it, and which were predicted by the prophets.

Dinner $1,000 a Plate

THERE was a dinner given by "six men interested in things historic and literary" at the leading hotel in Philadelphia, the other night, which cost $1,000 a plate. The average workingman and minister in America get but $700 a year, out of which he has to feed, clothe, house and educate his family. He could live a year and a half on the price of one of the plates at that dinner. Curiosity is taxed to the limit to find how a plate could be made to cost that much, though the plates themselves were solid gold and went as souvenirs. If it had been a poker game it can easily be seen how some of the plates might have cost more than the thousand dollars. A news dispatch gives this description of the way some of the money went. "The feast was spread in a room transformed into a woodland dell. A canopy of dogwood adorned the entrance. An adjoining room, to which the guests went after their meal, was decorated to resemble a woodland in springtime. Real apple blossoms and many rare plants helped to add to the springtime atmosphere." There never was a time when such extravagance could be justified. But of all times this is the most untimely for such a thing. At this time, when most of Europe is on short rations, when millions on millions have starved and are starving to death, when the wage-earners have such a hard time to meet the high cost of living, when there are so many poor and suffering that need help, such a luxurious waste is a folly, a shame. It is an imitation of that luxury and extravagance which have overthrown some of the greatest empires of the world. Fortunately the $1,000 plates are rare, and our people of wealth dispense their means with a generous hand. The apostle James thus speaks to foolish rich men who make a poor use of their money: "Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be against you. Ye have lived in pleasure, and been wanton." (James 5 : 2, 3, 5.)

Father and Son in Congress

SELDOM, if ever before, have father and son been members of the same Congress. United States Senator John H. Bankhead of Alabama has been in the United States Senate for ten years, and his son, William B Bankhead, was recently elected for his first term a member of the House of Representatives from the Tenth Alabama District. The Senator had been a member of the House of Representatives for twenty years, making a continuous service in Congress of thirty years. He was born in Moscow, Alabama, in 1842. He served in the Confederate army for four years, and was wounded three times. He served in both branches of his state legislature before he was elected to Congress. The son, in following the footsteps of his father, reflects the good stock from which he came, and the careful training he has received. It is rather the exception that statesmen have sons who follow in their footsteps, though John Quincy Adams, the son of John Adams, became President of the United States, and William Henry Harrison's grandson, Benjamin Harrison, also became President. It sometimes happens, but is not often the case, that a great financier, lawyer, doctor, preacher, scholar or artist measures up to the height of his father. As great men in any calling are few, it may be considered that one in a family is its share in the distribution of them. Besides, a big man shadows his children, and they cannot grow very large in the shade any more than a tree can. If the forester wishes a sapling to grow to any size he takes it out from the shade of the large tree and plants it where it can have sunlight and plenty of soil room for its roots. The success of young Bankhead is an exception to this rule. The Sanhedrin, Hebrew spelling of the Greek Sunedrion, "Assembly," was the supreme national tribunal of the Jews. It was this National Assembly before which Jesus was taken "And as soon as it was day, the elders of the people and the chief priests and the scribes came together and led him into their council." (Luke 22 : 66.)

Indiana Tornado Kills

IN a tornado in New Albany, Ind., on March 23, thirty-eight persons were killed, 200 injured and $1,000,000 worth of property destroyed. All at once, at 3.30 o'clock, the sky became black and a peculiar heavy cloud appeared close to the earth in the southwest. A few minutes later the gale struck at Corydon Pike two miles below the city, and after it had wrought heavy damage it moved southwest and entered New Albany at State Street, near Ealy, one of the thickly populated residence sections. With terrific speed it tore along for three blocks, laying everything low in its way. Reaching the intersection of State and Pearl, however, it rose high in air and leaped over the city one mile to the outskirts, where it came down again and struck the earth at Vincennes Street and Charlestown Road. Here it played havoc with three blocks of homes and shops along Vincennes Street before it rose again and passed away. In all there were about six full blocks laid waste by the storm. The chaos which came in the wake of the storm was quickly succeeded by organized efforts to assist those in need. The injured soon overflowed the city's public hospital and others were taken to the Young Men's Christian Association and to private homes. Every available physician in New Albany was called into service, with others from Louisville and Jeffersonville. Members of the staffs of Louisville hospitals were hurried here. There were many acts of heroism on the part of firemen, officers and private citizens. We live in a realm of tornados, mental, moral and spiritual, as well as physical. There are financial storms that blow fortunes away, social winds that blast the home and heart, moral winds that lay low character, and spiritual storms that wreck the soul. Christ has come to us to be a shelter from all storms. The prophet thus represents him: "And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest." (Isa. 32 : 2.)

National Orange Show

A NATIONAL orange show was recently held at San Bernardino, Calif. Could anything be more fitting than an orange show in California? The word orange is from the Latin word aurantium, which is from aurum, gold, because the orange is yellow like gold. California was the pioneer gold state, and now holds second place among the gold-producing states, and raises a large supply of splendid oranges. It is likely that the value of the golden fruit picked off her trees exceeds that of the gold out of her mines. Florida and Louisiana also are orange-producing states. Oranges are of all flavors, very sweet, moderately sweet, sour, or even bitter. They are of all sizes, from the kumquat of China and Japan, not much bigger than a gooseberry, to the navel orange of South America, double the size of the ordinary orange. Orange trees are very profitable. They sometimes live to be 100 or even 150 years old. We do not find the orange or lemon among the fruits of the Hebrews. They had olives, grapes, figs, dates, almonds, citrons, and so forth. Our golden fruit is a symbol of the rich fruits that grow on spiritual trees, to which the prophet thus refers: "For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth, so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations." (Isa. 61 : 11.)

Poker Club, Bible Class

AT Wilkes-Barre, Pa., a group of eight business men used to play poker of an evening at each other's homes. At the close of the game the bottle was opened. Billy Sunday's revival touched them, and the chips gave way to the sacred leaves of God's Word, and the eight formed the nucleus of a Bible class, to which no one was eligible who was not a backslider, or who had been in the habit of attending church. The influence of that class will reach to eternity. This is their creed: "We hereby declare our faith in Almighty God and the divinity of Jesus Christ, and agree, God helping us, to live Christian lives to the best of our ability." They realize the meaning of Christ's words: "I am the way, the truth, and the life." (John 14 : 6.)

Woman 100 Years Old

THE one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Mrs. Eliza Ann Broughton, known as the "Mother of the Confederacy," was quietly celebrated at her home near Baltimore the other day in the presence of her children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. She cut the cake that was lighted with a hundred candles, and was happy during the celebration. She does housework, sews beautifully, reads the daily paper, enjoys her Bible, and lives a devout, Christly life. This prophecy has been fulfilled with reference to her: "And even to your old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs will I carry you." (Isa. 46 : 4.)

Leghorn Hens Discounted

LEGHORN hens have been the favorites with most farmers because of their great production of eggs. In Kansas City and other places there are ordinances requiring all foodstuffs to be sold by the pound, and Leghorn eggs being so much smaller than the rest are at a disadvantage. They only weigh a pound and a quarter to the dozen, while other kinds weigh from a pound and a half to a pound and three-quarters to the dozen. The dainty Leghorn hen will have to grow bigger and lay larger eggs, or step aside. Eggs in an emergency could be made to help out amazingly in the solution of the cost of living. Great as the egg-producing industry is in this country, it is only a hint of what it might be made by a general scientific, intensive poultry-raising. The hen was an important factor in the food supply of the Hebrews. Christ makes this reference to her: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" (Matt. 23 : 37.)

Lincoln's Statue for Paris

THE statue of Lincoln which America is giving France will be erected in Paris. Methonard, president of the council in a becoming letter to the premier expressed the gratitude the city felt at the honor of being the custodian of so sacred a gift. The letter says: "Our American friends may be sure we shall give the statue of President Lincoln a location worthy of it." Lincoln belongs to us not only, but to all nations that love liberty, and to all times that revere truth, righteousness and love. There is this reference to a national monument of the Jews: "These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever." (Joshua 4 : 7.)

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, who less than two years before had been the petted daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont, but for three months had been nurse to the children of Burke's aunt. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement to Helen Barnet. But Burke's father refused his consent to a marriage which he considered a bad match, and as a compromise it was agreed that the young man should give up his college career and go into his father's factory immediately to learn the business from the ground up; and then if at the end of a year he had not changed his mind, he might marry, though even then he must not bring his bride to the old home. In a month, however, a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once his father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first weeks of the honeymoon were spent by the inexperienced young couple in finding a home, and the succeeding months in trying to live in a flat on $15 a week

AT nine o'clock the following morning Mr. and Mrs. Burke Denby sallied forth to buy the furniture for their "tenement," as Helen called it, until her husband's annoyed remonstrances changed the word to "apartment."

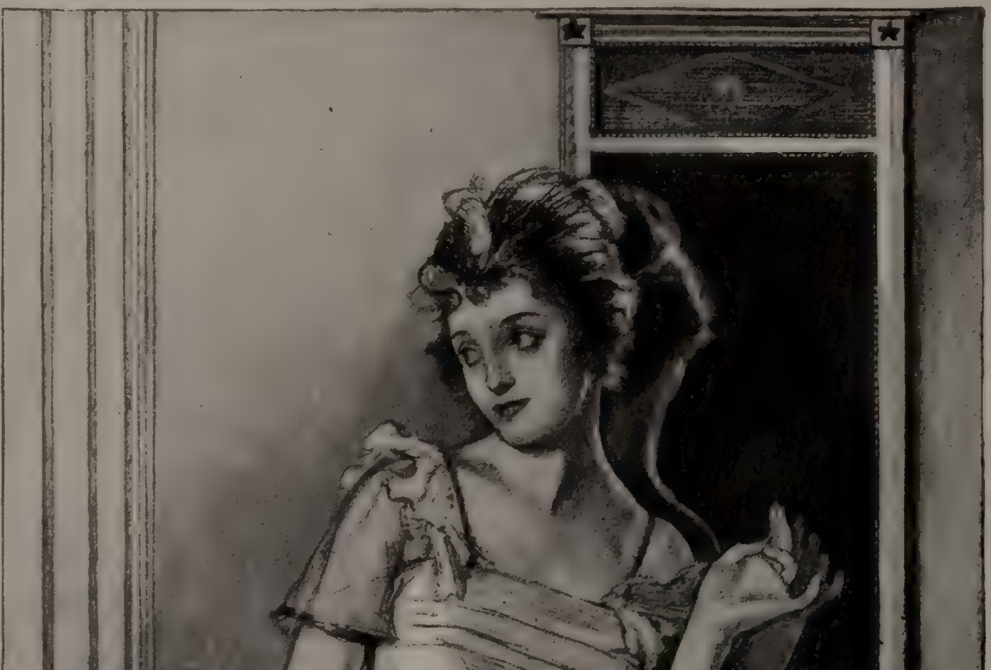
Burke Denby learned many things during the next few hours. He learned first that tables and chairs and beds and stoves—really decent ones that a fellow could endure the sight of—cost a prodigious amount of money. But, to offset this, and to make life really worth the living, after all, it seemed that one might buy a quantity sufficient for one's needs, and pay for them in instalments, week by week. This idea, while not wholly satisfactory, seemed the only way of stretching their limited means to cover their many needs; and, after some hesitation, it was adopted.

There remained then only the matter of selection; and it was just here that Burke Denby learned something else. He learned that two people, otherwise apparently in perfect accord, could disagree most violently over the shape of a chair or the shade of a rug. Indeed, he would not have believed it possible that such elements of soul torture could lie in a mere matter of color or texture. And how any one with eyes and sensibilities could wish to select for one's daily companions such a mass of gingerbread decoration and glaring colors as seemed to meet the fancy of his wife, he could not understand. Neither could he understand why all his selections and preferences were promptly dubbed "dingy" and "homely," nor why nothing that he liked pleased her at all. As such was certainly the case, however, he came to express these preferences less and less frequently. And in the end he always bought what she wanted, particularly as the price on her choice was nearly always lower than the one on his—which was an argument in its favor that he found it hard to refute.

Tractable as he was as to quality, however, he did have to draw a sharp line as to quantity; for Helen—with the cheerful slogan, "Why, it's only twenty-five cents a week more, Burke!"—seemed not to realize that there was a limit even to the number of those one might spend on sixty dollars a month. True, at the beginning she did remind him that they could "eat less" till they "got the things paid for," and that her clothes were "all new, anyhow, being a bride, so!" But she had not said that again. Perhaps because she saw the salesman turn his back to laugh, and perhaps because she was a little frightened at the look on her husband's face. At all events, when Burke did at last insist that they had bought quite enough, she acquiesced with some measure of grace.

Burke himself, when the shopping was finished, drew a sigh of relief, yet with an inward shudder at the recollection of certain things marked "Sold to Burke Denby."

"Oh, well," he comforted himself. "Helen's happy—and that's the main thing; and I shan't see them much. I'm away days and asleep nights." Nor did it occur to him that this was not the usual attitude of a supposedly proud bridegroom toward his new little nest of a home.



Was she not each night the loving, daintily gowned wife?

Getting settled in the little Dale Street apartment was, so far as Burke was concerned, a mere matter of moving from the hotel and dumping the contents of his trunk into his new chiffonier and closet. True, Helen, looking tired and flurried (and not nearly so pretty as usual), brought to him some borrowed tools, together with innumerable curtains and rods and nails and hooks that simply must be put up, she said, before she could do a thing. But Burke, after a half-hearted trial—during which he mashed his thumb and bored three holes in wrong places—flew into a passion of irritability, and bade her get the janitor who "owned the things" to do the job, and to pay him what he asked—'twould be worth it, no matter what it was!

With a very hasty kiss then Burke banged out of the house and headed for the Denby Iron Works.

It was not alone the curtains or the offending hammer that was wrong with Burke Denby that morning. The time had come when he must not only meet his fellow employees, and take his place among them, but he must face his father. And he was dreading yet longing to see his father. He had not seen him since he bade him good-night and went upstairs to his own room the month before—to write that farewell note.

Once since coming back from his wedding trip he had been tempted to leave town and never see his father again—until he should have made for himself the name and the money that he was going to make. Then he would come back and cry: "Behold, this is I, your son, and this is Helen, my wife, who, you see, has not dragged me down!" He would not, of course, talk like that. But he would show them. He would! This had been when he first learned from Brett of the allowance-cutting, and of his father's implacable anger.

Then had come the better, braver decision. He would stay where he was. He would make the name and the money right here, under his father's very eyes. It would be harder, of course; but there would then be all the more glory in the winning. Besides, to leave now would look like defeat—would make one seem almost like a quitter. And his father hated quitters! He would like to show his father. He would show his father. And he would show him right here. And had not Helen, his dear wife, said that she would aid him? As if he could help winning out under those circumstances!

It was with thoughts such as these that he went now to meet his father. Especially was he thinking of Helen, dear Helen—poor Helen, struggling back there with those abominable hooks and curtains. And he had been such a brute to snap her up so crossly! He would not do it again. It was only that he was so dreading this first meeting with his father. After that it would be easier. There would not be anything then only just to keep steadily going till he'd made good—he and Helen. But now—father would be proud to see how finely he was taking it!

With chin up and shoulders back, therefore, Burke Denby walked into his father's office.

"Well, father," he began, with cheery briskness. Then, instantly, voice and manner changed as he took a hurried step forward. "Dad, what is it? Are you ill?"

So absorbed had Burke Denby been over the part he himself was playing in this little drama of Denby and Son, that he had given no thought as to the probable looks or actions of any other member of the cast. He was quite unprepared, therefore, for the change in the man he now saw before him—the pallor, the shrunken cheeks, the stooped shoulders, the unmistakable something that made the usually erect, debonair man look suddenly worn and old.

"Dad, you are ill!" exclaimed Burke in dismay.

John Denby got to his feet at once. He even smiled and held out his hand. Yet Burke, who took the hand, felt suddenly that there were uncounted miles of space between them.

"Ah, Burke, how are you? No, I'm not ill at all. And you—are you well?"

"Er—ah—oh, yes, very well—er—very well."

"That's good. I'm glad."

There was a brief pause. A torrent of words swept to the tip of the younger man's tongue; but nothing found voice except another faltering "Er—yes, very well!" which Burke had not meant to say at all. There was a second brief pause, then John Denby sat down.

"You will find Brett in his office. You have come to work, I dare say," he observed, as he turned to the letters on his desk.

"Er—yes," stammered the young man. The next moment he found himself alone, white and shaken, the other side of his father's door.

To work? Oh, yes, he had come to work; but he had come first to talk. There were a whole lot of things he had meant to say to his father. First, of course, there would have had to be something in the nature of an apology or the like to patch up the quarrel. Then he would tell him how he was really going to make good—he and Helen. After that they could get down to one of their old-time chats. They always had been chums—he and dad; and they hadn't had a talk for four weeks. Why, for three weeks he had been saving up a story, a dandy story that dad would appreciate! And there were other things, serious things, that—

And here already he had seen his father, and it was over. And he had not said a word—nothing of what he had meant to say. He believed he would go back—

With an angry gesture Burke Denby turned and extended his hand halfway toward the closed door. Then, with an impatient shrug, he whirled about and strode toward the door marked "J. A. Brett, General Manager."

If young Denby had obeyed his first impulse and reentered his father's office he would have found the man with his head bowed on the desk, his arms outflung.

John Denby, too, was white and shaken. He, too, had been dreading this meeting, and longing for it—that it might be over. There was now, however, on his part, no feeling of chagrin and impotence because of things that had not been said. There was only a shuddering relief that things had not been said; that he had been able to carry it straight through as he had planned; that he had not shown his boy how much he—cared. He was glad that his pride had been equal to the strain; that he had not weakly succumbed at the first glimpse of his son's face, the first touch of his son's hand, as he had so feared that he would do.

And he had not succumbed—though he had almost gone down before the quick terror and affectionate dismay that had leaped into his son's voice and eyes at sight of his own changed appearance. (Why could not he keep those abominable portions of his anatomy from being so wretchedly telltale?) But he had remembered in time. Did the boy think, then, that a mere word of sympathy now could balance the scale against so base a disregard of everything loyal and filial a month ago? Then he would show that it could not.

What if he did know now, even better than he had known it all these last miserable four weeks, that his whole world had lain in his boy's hand, that his whole life had been bounded by his boy's smile, his whole soul immersed in his boy's future? What if he did know that all the power and wealth and fame of name that he had won were as the dust in his fingers—if he might not pass them on to his son? He was not going to let Burke know this. Indeed, no!

Burke had made his own bed. He should lie in it. Deliberately he had chosen to cast aside the love and companionship of a devoted father at the beck of an almost unknown girl's hand. Should the father then offer again the once-scorned love and companionship? Had he no pride—no proper sense of simple right and justice? No self-respect, even?

It was thus, and by arguments such as these, that John Denby had lashed himself into the state of apparently cool, courteous indifference that had finally carried him successfully through the interview just closed.

For a long time John Denby sat motionless, his arms outflung across the letters that might have meant so much, but that did mean so little, to him—now. Then slowly he raised his head and fixed somber, longing eyes on the door that had so recently closed behind his son.

The boy was in there with Brett now—his boy. He was being told that his wages for the present were to be fifteen dollars a week, and that he was expected to live within his income—that the wages were really very liberal, considering his probable value to the company at the first. He would begin at the bottom, as had been planned years ago; but with this difference; he would be promoted now only when he had earned it. He would have been pushed rapidly ahead to the top, had matters been as they once were. Now he must demonstrate and prove his ability.

All this Brett was telling Burke now. Poor Burke! Brett was so harsh, so uncompromising. As if it weren't tough enough to have to live on a paltry fifteen dollars a week, without—

John Denby sighed and rose to his feet. Aimlessly he fidgeted about the spacious, well-appointed office. Twice he turned toward the door as if to leave the room. Once he reached a hesitating hand toward the push-button on his desk. Then determinedly he sat down and picked up one of his letters.

Brett was right. It was the best way; the only way. And it was well, indeed, that Brett had been delegated to do the telling. If it had been himself now—! Shucks! If it had been himself, the boy would only have had to look his reproach—and his wages would have been doubled on the spot! Fifteen dollars a week—Burke! Why, the boy could not—Well, then, he need not have been so foolish, so headstrong, so heartlessly disregardful of his father's wishes. He had brought it upon himself, entirely, entirely!

Whereupon, with an angry exclamation, John Denby shifted about in his hand the letter which for three minutes he had been holding before his eyes upside down.

CHAPTER V

THE WIFE

HELEN DENBY had never doubted her ability to be a perfect wife. As a girl, her vision had pictured a beauteous creature moving through a glorified world of love and admiration, ease and affluence.

Later, at the time of her marriage to Burke Denby, her vision had altered sufficiently to present a picture of herself as the sweet good angel of the old Denby mansion, the forgiving young wife who lays up no malice against an unappreciative father-in-law. Even when, still later (upon their return from their wedding trip and upon her learning of John Denby's decree of banishment), the vision was necessarily warped and twisted all out of semblance to its original outlines, there yet remained unchanged the basic idea of perfect wifehood.

Helen saw herself now as the martyr wife whose superb courage and self-sacrifice were to be the stepping-stones of a husband's magnificent success. She would be guide, counselor, and friend. (Somewhere she had seen those words. She liked them very much.) Unswervingly she would hold Burke to his high purpose. Untiringly she would lead him ever toward his goal of "making good."

She saw herself the sweet, loving wife, graciously presiding over the well-kept home, always ready, daintily gowned, to welcome his coming with a kiss, and to speed his going with a blessing. Then, when in due course he had won out, great would be her reward. With what sweet pride and gentle dignity would she accept the laurel wreath of praise (Helen had seen this expression somewhere, too, and liked it), which a remorseful but grateful world would hasten to lay at the feet of her who alone had made possible the splendid victory—the once despised, flouted wife—the wife who was to drag him down!

It was a pleasant picture, and Helen frequently dwelt upon it—especially the sweet-and-gentle-dignity-wife part. She found it particularly soothing during those first early days of housekeeping in the new apartment.

Not that she was beginning in the least to doubt her ability to be that perfect wife. It was only that to think of things as they would be was a pleasant distraction from thinking of things as they were. But of course it would be all right very soon, anyway, just as soon as everything got nicely to running.

Helen did wonder sometimes why the getting of "everything nicely to running" was so difficult. That a certain amount of training and experience was necessary to bring about the best results never occurred to her. If Helen had been asked to take a position as stenographer or church soloist, she would have replied at once that she did not know how to do the work. Into the position of home-maker, however, she stepped with cheerful confidence, her eyes only on the wonderful success she was going to make.

To Helen housekeeping was something like a clock that you wound up in the morning to run all day. And even when at the end of a week she could not help seeing that not once yet had she got around to being the "sweet, daintily gowned wife welcoming her husband to a well-kept home," before that husband appeared at the door, she still did not doubt her own capabilities. It was only that "things hadn't got to running yet." And it was always somebody else's fault, anyway—frequently her husband's. For if he did not come to dinner too early, before a thing was done, he was sure to be late, and thus spoil everything by her trying to keep things hot for him. And, of course, under such circumstances, nobody could expect one to be a sweet and daintily gowned wife!

Besides, there was the cookbook.

"Do you know, Burke," she finally wailed one night, between sobs, "I don't believe it's good for a thing—that old cookbook! I haven't got a thing out of it yet that's been real good. I've half a mind to take it back where I got it, and make them change it, or else give me back my money. I have, so there!"

"But, dearie," began her husband doubtfully, "you said yourself yesterday that you forgot the salt in the omelet, and the baking powder in the cake, and—"

"Well, what if I did?" she contended aggrievedly. "What's a little salt or baking powder? 'Twasn't but a pinch or a spoonful, anyhow, and I remembered all the other things. Besides, if those rules were any good they'd be worded so I couldn't forget part of the things. And, anyhow, I don't think it's very nice of you to b-blame me all the time when I'm doing the very best I can. I told you I couldn't cook, but you said you'd like anything I made, because I did it, and—"

"Yes, yes, darling, and so I do," interrupted the remorseful husband, hurriedly. And, to prove it, he ate the last scrap of the unappetizing concoction on his plate, which his wife said was a fish croquette. Afterward, still further to show his remorse, he helped her wash the dishes and set the rooms in order. Then together they went for a walk in the moonlight.

It was a beautiful walk, and it quite restored Helen to good nature. They went up on West Hill (where Helen particularly loved to go), and they laid wonderful plans of how one day they too, would build a big stone palace of a home up there—though Burke did say that, for his part, he liked Elm Hill quite as well; but Helen laughed him out of that "old-fashioned idea." At least he said no more about it.

They talked much of how proud Burke's father was going to be when Burke had made good, and of how ashamed and sorry he would be that he had so misjudged his son's wife. And Helen uttered some very sweet and beautiful sentiments concerning her intention of laying up no malice, her firm determination to be loving and forgiving.

Then together they walked home in the moonlight; and so thrilled and exalted were they that even the cheap little Dale Street living-room looked wonderfully dear. And Helen said that, after all, love was the only thing that mattered—that they just loved each other. And Burke said, "Yes, yes, indeed."

The vision of the sweet, daintily gowned wife and the perfect home was very clear to Helen as she dropped off to sleep that night; and she was sure that she could begin to realize it at once. But unfortunately she overslept the next morning—which was really Burke's fault, as she said, for he forgot to wind the alarm clock, and she was not used to getting up at such an unearthly hour, anyway, and she did not see why he had to do it, for that matter—he was really the son of the owner, even if he was called an apprentice.

This did not help matters any, for Burke never liked any reference to his position at the Works. To be sure, he did not say much, this time, except to observe stiffly that he would like his breakfast, if she would be so good as to get it—as if she were not already hurrying as fast as she could, and herself only half-dressed at that!

Of course the breakfast was a failure. Helen said that perhaps some people could get a meal of victuals on to the table, with a hungry man eyeing their every move, but she could not. Burke declared then that he really did not want any breakfast anyway, and he started to go; but as Helen only cried the more at this, he had to come back and comfort her—thereby, in the end, being both breakfastless and late to his work.

Helen, after he had gone, spent a blissfully wretched ten minutes weeping over the sad fate that should doom such a child of light and laughter as herself to the somber rôle of martyr wife, and wondered if, after all, it would not be really more impressive and more soul-torturing-with-remorse for the cruel father-in-law, if she should take poison, or gas, or something (not disfiguring), and lay herself calmly down to die, her beautiful hands crossed meekly upon her bosom.

Attractive as was this picture in some respects, it yet had its drawbacks. Then, too, there was the laurel wreath of praise due her later. She had almost forgotten that. On the whole, that would be preferable to the poison, Helen decided, as she began, with really cheerful alacrity, to attack the messy breakfast dishes.

It was not alone the cooking that troubled the young wife during that first month of housekeeping. Everywhere she found pitfalls for her unwary feet, from managing the kitchen range to keeping the living-room dusted.

And there was the money.

Helen's idea of money, in her happy, care-free girlhood, had been that it was one of the common necessities of life; and she accepted it as she did the sunshine—something she was entitled to; something everybody had. She learned the fallacy of this, of course, when she attempted to earn her own living; but in marrying the son of the rich John Denby she had expected to step back into the sunshine, as it were. It was not easy now to adjust herself to the change.

She did not like the idea of asking for every penny she spent, and it seemed as if she was always having to ask Burke for money; and, though he invariably handed it over with a nervously quick, "Why, yes, certainly! I don't mean you to have to ask for it, Helen"; yet she thought she detected a growing irritation in his manner each time. And on the last occasion he had added a dismayed, "But I hadn't any idea you could have got out so soon as this again!" And it made her feel very uncomfortable indeed.

As if she were to blame that it took so much butter and coffee and sugar and stuff just to get three meals a day! And as if it were her fault that that horrid cookbook was always calling for something she did not have, like mace, or summer savory, or thyme, and she had to run out and buy a pound of it! Didn't he suppose it took some money to stock up with things, when one hadn't a thing to begin with?

Helen had been on the point of saying something of this sort to her husband, simply as a matter of self-justification, when there unexpectedly came a most delightful solution of her difficulty.

It was the grocer who pointed the way.

"Why don't you open an account with us, Mrs. Denby?" he asked smilingly one day, in reply to her usual excuse that she could not buy something because

Evangelist Sunday's Sermon

Preached in the New York Tabernacle April 15 *

TEXT—II Timothy 2 : 15. "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

WE seem to be living in a new era. A great political, moral, social, economical era.

Whether we have been separated or combined in our advancement I am not going to discuss in detail, but I think it behooves the church of God workmen not to forget that we are facing the powers of darkness and opposition as never before in the history of Christianity.

There never has been a time when the people were more self-satisfied, self-complacent, self-centred than they are today.

Some imagine God Almighty will condone what evil they do. So many people in their own minds are climbing to heaven because of their deeds of philanthropy, but when the end comes and Almighty God strikes a balance on the books of record He will cut a square.

Some people think that a man who lives a fairly good life, goes to church, is true to his marriage vows, will stand just as good a show of going to heaven as the man who has been on the firing line and has been bullet meat and has worked and fought against the stoical indifference of the people of today.

They convey the impression today that no man will ultimately reach hell. I don't believe you can remember when you heard a sermon on hell. Well, you'll hear about hell while I am here.

God Almighty put hell in the Bible, and any preacher that sidesteps it because there are people sitting in the pews that don't like it ought to get out of the pulpit. He is simply trimming his sails to catch a passing breeze of popularity. If you do that you are a cipher. We have put on our money, "In God We Trust." Hot air!

Back to Christ and Pentecost

Let's get back to Christ, back to Pentecost, back to the Apostolic beliefs, back to the beliefs of our own forefathers, back to God's kingdom. God's got to come first and all other things can trail. The trouble is that you've got a lot of fool preachers who are breaking their necks to please you society dames. The most up-to-date thing on earth is the gospel of Jesus Christ.

There's a lot of preachers on earth who can preach the Gospel better than I, but there's not one living who can preach a better Gospel than "Bill." Not long ago my mother became very ill. I had her hurried to a hospital in Chicago; got the best surgeons money could get to attend her, hired a retinue of nurses to see that she would want for nothing. I saw to it that ma had every attention that woman could get on this earth and I told them to do everything in their power for her no matter what the cost, for she is my mother. The church of God, the church is my spritual mother and I would lay down my life for her this minute.

I believe in baseball. Why? Because I know the game is clean. I played it for eight years and I believe it is the squarest sport there is today. It is square because it hasn't got into the hands of the blackleg gamblers. Horse-racing is crooked because the gamblers have got hold of it.

The Cults and Isms

I think one of the biggest curses that ever came to America was the congress of religions, held in Chicago during the World's Fair. There were there Christian men sitting in with mutts like Hindus, followers of Zoroaster, Shintoism, Parsees, Confucius—they had their pagodas and joss houses and temples, and there were sun worshippers in Chicago, who built a high wall around a little joint—they built the house with glass and went in there to worship so that the sun would eliminate sin. They were sun worshippers.

We got Eddyism; they label it Christian Science. And of them all that is the worst fol-de-rol of the lot; the worst tommyrot that ever came down the pike.

Christian Science says Jesus is not Christ, the Son of God; the Bible says who is a liar, but that he who denies Jesus is Christ, he is a liar. Christian Science says there is no final judgment; the Bible says it is appointed unto men once to die, but after death judgment. Christian Science says prayer is idle; the Bible says "but yet shall every man pray," that Jesus Christ, being in agony, He prayed more earnestly, and His sweat was as drops of blood.

You know a man has printed a book, and they buy it up so fast they can't turn it off the press fast enough, in which he advocates that marriage should not be a life contract, but on the instalment plan, like you buy furniture.

They see a girl that is pretty good looking and they'll go up and say: "Sissie, let's make up and try it for six months, and if we like one another at the end of that time the same as we do now, we will continue; if we don't we will split up and call it off."

Thank God that such an infamous, God-forsaken, hell-born doctrine will never exist as long as man preaches God's word and woman will hear it.

The "Continental Sabbath"

Now I have not one word to say against any man or woman who was born or has come across the seas. We all originally came from across the sea, and I will be among the first to stand at Ellis Island and extend the hand of welcome to any man or woman who wants to come here and assimilate our ways and conditions, and live beneath the Stars and Stripes, but so help me God, if I will yield to any class or clique—and there are multitudes of them, a half million to a million every year—just multitudes of them—coming with just enough money and materials enough to escape being paupers and criminals, and they settle here and become a carbuncle on the neck of the body politic. They turn our idea of the Sabbath into the Continental idea, with their beer gardens and beer drinking. They are driving the Bible out of the public schools and letting in their dirty, licentious dances. Let them keep their hands off our schools. If they don't like our way, let them stay out.

I am an American from the top of my head to the bottom of my feet, and I will not yield to any man. Sixty-eight per cent. of the criminals of the United States come from foreign shores, or are born of foreign parents. So you see that that has something to do with it. That is not the only thing; 50 years of negative preaching on the part of a good many preachers has something to do with it, too. The liberalizing tendency has stunted its growth and dried up its fountain head. This old world needs Jesus Christ as much today, here, in the 20th century, as she ever needed Him. She always will need Him, and don't go away with the idea that a time will ever come when you will be immune from the need of this atoning blood of Jesus Christ to keep you out of hell.

There is another crowd that gives us a fascinating mixture of ethical culture, higher criticism and new thought. The Bible says there is nothing new under the sun; it is the same old devil that inspires what you call new; it is the same old stuff, only it has a new name.

Christless Churches

A godless cowboy once went to a brownstone church—with a high-toned preacher—I am a half-way house between the brownstone church and the Salvation Army. They are both needed and so is the half-way house. Well, this fellow went to one of these brownstone churches, and after the preacher had finished the cowboy thought he had to go up and compliment the preacher, as he saw others doing, and so he sauntered down the aisle with his sombrero under his arm, his breeches stuck in his boots, a bandana handkerchief around his neck, his gun and bowie knife in his belt, and he walked over and said: "Hanged if I didn't fight shy of you fellows—but I'll tell you I sat here and listened to you for an hour and you monkeyed less with religion than any fellow I ever heard in my life." They have taken away the Lord and don't know where to find him.

A woman who was to lead a prayer meeting was on her way downtown to perform the task when her attention was attracted by a display of headgear in a milliner's window. She stopped and looked at, this hat, that hat and the other hat, carefully noting the prices tagged on them and admiring their beauty. Suddenly she remembered the prayer meeting. She rushed to the place where it was being held and, all out of breath, took the platform. Hurriedly opening a hymn book, she said: "Now, let's sing No. $4.17." Her mind was not on that meeting. Not on your life.

In New York city some time ago at a big labor meeting, there were 7000 men present, and they were discussing conditions, when one big, broad-shouldered, deep-chested man got up, and said: "I propose three cheers for Jesus Christ," and the very building shook with the cheering of that body. The world is looking for some Moses to lead it out of bondage. I want to tell you that the biggest mistakes I have ever made were when I temporized with the devil. When I have been firm and true to God and refused to bow and scrape and truck with the world, when I have hurled anathemas of God against ranks of sin; when I refused to subsidize my fear of criticism, when I stood four-square to the wind, I have been blessed.

When I have bowed and ducked and truckled, when I have played to the grandstand, when I have subsidized my fear of criticism, I have miserably failed. There are a lot of fools that think that success can only be gained by moral placidity; by compromise on all moral, religious, political and ethical questions, instead of hurling God's anathemas into the ranks of their opponents.

Sounding the Charge

Thaw out your miserable formality. I believe the pews in every church ought to be free. Oh, I know you don't agree with me, some of you; if you had religion you would. Many a poor man is made to feel like a beggar in the house of God because he's got to stand and wait until so and so comes before he knows whether he can sit down or not.

If I read the signs of the times aright it behooves the church of God to wake up and fight as it has never fought before, for you'll see the lines between the man and the devil, the church and the saloon, the home and brothel drawn so tightly that your game will be lost and the people keep rushing to hell.

I sound the charge! I sound the charge! How many of you will help me to save this city for Christ? Stand up, those who are in this fight to win.

*In delivering this sermon, which was furnished to the Christian Herald by special arrangement with Mr. Sunday's secretary, the evangelist introduced a number of variations, as is his usual custom.

New York Cheers Billy Sunday

IF anybody on the island of Manhattan had any doubt as to the probable success of the Sunday campaign, that doubt would have been dissolved in assurance, if he had been at the two meetings at the big tabernacle on April 8, when the campaign began. The afternoon meeting was scheduled for 2.30 o'clock, but the 20,000 people who heard the afternoon address were in their seats before 2 o'clock, and at least half as many failed to gain admission. In the evening the doors were opened at 6 o'clock and by 6.15 more than 5,000 people were in the seats. At 7 o'clock people were being refused admission. At 7.30 when the evening service began, not a vacant chair was in evidence anywhere. Mr. Sunday preached at the afternoon service the sermon printed in the Christian Herald last week, making some slight changes to fit the day.

Mr. Sunday himself appeared in the tabernacle unexpectedly, as the pianos were thundering out the music of a stirring hymn. Somebody in the audience caught sight of the evangelist, before he had quite reached his place on the stage, and the single handclapping of the original discoverer was almost immediately drowned in a great burst of applause which was Mr. Sunday's welcome from his audience. But the applause was not visible enough and so, from every corner of the great tabernacle, fluttered handkerchiefs in a Chautauqua salute, welcoming the little general to the campaign against sin in the metropolis. The welcome of the evangelist was however, completely surpassed by a demonstration which followed his declaration that he did not want New York's money, but only New York. He was meeting the charge that he was after money in the work he was doing. He not only met the charge, but overwhelmed it, for he announced that he would not take for himself a penny of the freewill offering given at the close of the campaign; but after paying the necessary expenses of his party, he would divide the money between the American Red Cross and the army work of the Y. M. C. A. The tabernacle was almost surrounded by automobiles from which women urged the men of the tabernacle crowd to enlist in the navy.

In the afternoon, Mr. Sunday said: "The soldier who breaks every regulation but is found on the firing line in the hour of battle, is better than the God-forsaken mutt who won't enlist and who does all he can to keep others from enlisting. In these days all are patriots or traitors to your country and the cause of Jesus Christ." Just there the audience rose and cheered. Again, later in the address, Mr. Sunday took occasion to deny reports that he had ever said in private or in public that the German nation should be blotted off the map. "For the German people," he said, "I have nothing but love, nothing but sympathy, nothing but pity in these days of conflict. I believe you will find no more loyal, brave, or patriotic people beneath the Stars and Stripes than those with German blood in their veins. The German people have been blindly led; they have had the doctrine that might makes right and that the end justifies the means, inoculated into them for generations. What we want is to set them free from the militarism that has enslaved them."

In the evening, his address took an even more patriotic turn, and after a peroration in which he told of the French drummer boy who, knowing not how to beat a retreat, had led an army to victory, Mr. Sunday said, "I say to the forces of evil and to the enemy that in our country we don't know how to beat the retreat. . . . Our flag has never been unfurled for conquest, and we are not unfurling it for conquest now. We are unfurling the flag for the liberty of the world."

Just here Mr. Sunday reached back from his pulpit and was handed an American flag which he unfurled, standing upon the top of his pulpit and waving it over the heads of the people. But before the folds of the flag broke, the audience was on its feet cheering and clapping and waving its handkerchiefs in a wild but happy demonstration for Mr. Sunday, for the flag and for the cause of Christ.

Dedicating the Big Tabernacle

THE great New York tabernacle, which for three months will be the religious center of the metropolis, was dedicated on the afternoon of April 1. More than 16,000 people heard the dedication addresses by Bishop Luther B. Wilson of the Methodist Episcopal Church and by Governor Whitman of the State of New York. The dedication was not, however, wholly a matter of addresses, for an inspiring responsive service had been prepared in which the whole congregation joined in dedicating the tabernacle to the business of rebuilding broken homes, of reestablishing broken faiths, of mending broken hearts, of healing shattered lives, of inspiring the young and heartening the aged, of destroying evil, and of winning the lost for the honor of Jehovah and Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit, and for the glory of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit. The dedication service, held as it was on the eve of momentous national events, was marked by many expressions of loyalty to the flag and to the nation. The altar was draped in the national colors.

Bishop Luther B. Wilson in his address said: "In moments when the great principles of nations are in jeopardy, men show whether they are patriots or partisans. If they are patriots they rise above the principles of party and are guided by the welfare of the nation. This tabernacle is not adorned with rich hangings, like that first tabernacle of the Israelites in the wilderness. But here" (laying his hand on the flag draped over the pulpit), "here is an ornament, here is a banner, here is a symbol, which is so deep in our lives that we call it a holy thing. Today it is not a question of Jefferson or Hamilton in the nation. It is a question of Washington and Lincoln in the nation; and about those names and about this old flag must Americans gather as Americans never gathered before. In like manner I welcome the cooperation of denominations in this work; I hail gladly the day when it is not a question of Wesley or Calvin, not a question of creeds; when above all the personalities of human history we look into the face of Jesus Christ."

"God knows what the morrow has in store for us as a people. If we have war it is not our courage that will be put to the test; there is no lack of courage among the people of our land, and there never has been. What will be put to the test is our national character, our sense of justice, our capacity for self-restraint. Are we a Christian nation? Are we willing to live up to the religion we profess? Are we willing to die for it?

"It does not matter what tongue we speak, if we are loyal to the greatest experiment in democracy the world has ever known. Speaking for the people of the whole State, I express their profound hope for the success of this undertaking."

The neighborhood prayer meetings continued up to the last to grow in interest and power. By the middle of the week preceding the opening of the campaign, there had been 5,738 meetings held with a total attendance of 72,321. So encouraging was the spirit of these meetings and so great their religious momentum, that it was decided to continue them for a while after the beginning of the campaign in weekly meetings in the various neighborhoods. While the prayer meetings have reported some decisions for Christ, the principal result, as was expected, has been a great quickening of the church members of New York in power for service. Thousands of people have gained a new insight of the real meaning of the Christian life and a new vision of the Christ. It has been said that where there is no vision the people perish. The converse is equally true: that where the vision is, there the people are made alive. Vision has come to the greatest American city, a vision that will be written into redeemed and reconsecrated lives during the three months of Mr. Sunday's preaching in the tabernacle.

The force of ushers has been divided into regiments of 750 men, with captains, lieutenants and sergeants in charge of various divisions of the tabernacle. Mr. Howard Whitfield has had charge of the selecting and drilling of these men, and he had the satisfaction, at the dedication of the tabernacle, of seeing his organization work flawlessly in the handling of almost as large a crowd as the tabernacle is liable to see. While the tabernacle seats 20,000, at least 3,000 of these are choir seats to which the ushers need to pay little attention. The main tabernacle seats 16,000, and there is room for some thousands more to stand, so that the tabernacle will probably hold at its ultimate limit of packing, some 22,000 persons. The building itself is 334 by 247. There are 38 doors, and the seats on the main floor are ranged in 48 sections, and three aisles run entirely across the building. The chorus, which has been organized for the campaign, also received a successful tryout at the dedication, being led by Professor Tali Esen Morgan.

Even the boys and girls have been organized for work in connection with the great campaign. One boy and two girls from each Sunday school of the more than 300 cooperating churches have been appointed on a great committee, of which W. W. Hall is chairman. This committee, with the help of some adult members, will arrange group meetings of boys and girls. The members of the committee will be one means by which will be advertised the meetings for children which will be held during the campaign in the churches nearest to the schoolhouses. In every Sunday campaign a large number of the total conversions listed are conversions of boys and girls through these meetings for school children, held under the personal direction of Miss Alice M. Gamlin of Mr. Sunday's staff. There is every reason in the world to be glad over the conversion of the oldest sinner extant, but it is a much greater service to the Kingdom to set the feet of a child in the way of salvation. The work for children of the Sunday campaign effectively supplements the Sunday school and Young People's work in the bringing of children to a vital Christian faith.

The Soldier's Handbook

FIFTEEN millions of copies of the Scriptures, chiefly Testaments and Gospels, and in some cases smaller portions of the Word of God, seems to be an almost incredible quantity, and yet it approximates the number of copies which have been circulated by the Scripture Gift Mission since the European War began.

Do the men desire the Scriptures, and do they read them? A lad in Gallipoli had a Testament given to him by the Scripture Gift Mission on leaving for the front. It was the only copy in his trench, and he was constantly being asked for the loan of his book, so much so that it was rarely in his possession. He asked his comrades whether they really wanted to read God's Word, because if so he would cut the book up in pieces, so that they could exchange the pages among themselves. This was done, and the soldier, writing home of the incident, asked for sufficient Testaments so that he might supply each of his comrades with a copy.

Many do not care to go into the trenches without a copy of God's Word. They look upon it with a kind of superstition, but even this God uses for his own glory, for often in idle moments the men take the little Testaments from their pockets in the trenches and dugouts and read them. And when we think of the millions upon millions of the best manhood of Europe being pitted against each other in deadly conflict, surely the best book to provide for "the man of war" is "the Book of Peace."

Solder and Babbitts

"Minted" with Gold-Standard Accuracy

From the great mints of the nation comes a stream of gold coins, each made from metal of exactly the same purity and "fineness" and alloyed in exactly the same proportions. By maintaining this supreme degree of accuracy, the gold standard of the country is upheld, our national credit supported, our currency system insured and our business transacted.

From our Dutch Boy factories comes a stream of solder bars and babbitt ingots, each made from metal of the same purity and "fineness" and alloyed in the same proportions as every other of its kind.

By this great accuracy, the engineer and the manufacturer, the tinsmith and the machinist, the electrician and the plumber are enabled to get solder and babbitt exactly as they want it, always the same.

Dutch Boy solders are made in all degrees of fineness, from the No. 111 for extra high grade work to the No. 888 for wiping purposes.

Dutch Boy babbitts are likewise made in all grades. There is Phoenix Metal for great strains and high speeds, Heavy Pressure Metal to withstand severe pounding, Perfection Anti-Friction Metal for heavy strains but low speeds, and many others.

Summer Not So Far Away

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

SUMMER waits around the corner of the softly smiling day—Summer with its wealth of blossoms, Summer with its new-mown hay. Soon the trees, green-leafed, will beckon, soon the fragrant woods will call—soon the crops will spring toward heaven as the sun shines over all.

Summer comes! Our pulses quicken in the half-forgotten way; Summer waits around the corner of the softly smiling day! And we linger touched by longing, in the Land of Long Ago, where the ghosts of childhood greet us and the winds of memory blow.

Shining fields—do you remember? Daisy-dotted like the sky! Great star daisies, bowing, nodding, as the gentle breeze creeps by? Gentians growing in the meadow where the brook dipped out of sight? Great-eyed gentians, blue and dusky as the sky when day meets night? Buttercups as gold as sunshine (oh, the gold of long ago!), mignonette and pansy flowers, lady slippers in a row? Hollyhocks still proudly standing where the wall had crumbled down, tiger lilies in the garden, flaming orange flecked with brown?

How the weeping willow branches overhung the old mill stream! How a bird-note high above us set the fancy all adream! How the clouds were fairy castles built of hopes untouched by dread! How the ground seemed like a cushion fit to rest a queenly head!

Oh, the wonder days of summer in the Land of Long Ago! How we wandered, happy children thrilled with laughter, to and fro! How we picked the purple berries, staining eager finger-tips! How we searched for forest treasures, songs upon our smiling lips! How the magic of just living filled our souls with joy untold! We were rich in youth and romance, we were rich in more than gold!

Summer in the open country—oh, the days of Long Ago, when we wandered through life's playtime, happy children, to and fro!

SUMMER waits around the corner, and the Spring is on the land! But the city is—the city, and folk do not understand! Some, too busy, do not heed it; some, unknowing, turn away; some, with tired eyes bent earthward, think a day is just—a day. But this morning, as I hurried down the crowded city street, I could feel the thrill of summer! Something seemed to guide my feet to a little park that nestles, an oasis, in the way—an oasis in the city. There the little children play near a crumbled marble fountain; there the city sparrows call; and the sun, as in the country, smiles a greeting over all!

To the little park I wandered in the morning of the day. Every spray of grass seemed singing, "Summer's not so far away." Tiny flowers (stunted, maybe) peered at me; a sunbeam strayed toward me from the merry corner where the little children played—played at fairies, as we used to; played at giants tall and grim. Overhead the trees were showing baby leaves on every limb. Marble fountain, childish voices, dancing sunshine seemed to say, "Spring is here—here in the city; Summer's not so far away!"

In a corner sat an artist, sketching, with his gaze intent. I stood near and watched, unbidden, watched the colors that he blent; watched the growing of his fancy, watched the magic of his brush; watched him, silent, and the city, with its clamor and its rush, seemed to fade into the stillness of the Land of Long Ago—to the land of little children—to the land that artists know! For he painted, yes, from memory, just an old forgotten nook, fringed by slender ribbon grasses, where some prehistoric brook might have left its faint impression, where the oak trees cast their shade, where the flowers, smiling gayly, grew and flourished unafraid!

Other people stopped to watch him; men, with shoulders worn from toil, watched the artist as he pictured just a bit of country soil. Women, ragged-shawled and tired, looked upon his work and sighed; then went on to meet the future that was waiting, wistful-eyed.

Through the park a breeze came creeping, and it touched the artist's hair; and he paused and glancing, saw us as we stood and watched him there. And he blushed to see us watching, and I knew that he had strayed through the country woods in summer where real country breezes played. And I knew the small oasis in the busy city street seemed a bit of meadow to him, where the air was cool and sweet; and I knew that he'd forgotten city houses in a row, and I knew that he was living in the Land of Long Ago. Standing there, I smiled, but swiftly, as I heard him softly say, "Yes, it's just the farm I came from. . . . Summer seems so near today!"

HOW we used to walk together laughing, through the after-glow, when the road was touched with darkness, and the shadows trembled low! How we used to plan our futures—great careers that youth can plan! How ambition stretched out, boundless, farther than the eye could scan! How the wonder of the Summer made us dream of fame and power, when the world should bow to greet us! (Ah, each memory-tinted hour comes again with whispered message—fills my heart with love and praise.) How we used to wander, carefree, through our vivid yesterdays!

Springtime—even in the city! Springtime, in the very air! Springtime, if you will but seek it, waits for finding everywhere. In the canvas of an artist, where the country lives again; in the parks where city flowers grow, refreshed by April's rain; in the parks, where childish flowers crown their tiny Queen o' May, Springtime comes—and who would stop it? Summer's not so far away!

What though we may never reach it—mystic Land of Long Ago? We may dream of Youth and Summer while the winds of memory blow! We may listen, open-hearted, while forgotten voices call. Pipes of Pan? Yes, in the city! And the sunshine over all. Summer, oh, the charm of Summer! Thrilling in the same old way! Waiting just around the corner of the softly smiling day!

A New Way of Raising Church Funds

THESE are busy days in one of the small Methodist churches of Paterson, N. J. On a recent Sunday evening the pastor invited W. H. Gould, a friend, to his church to speak. Mr. Gould came, and made a brief address, which impressed the people present. He then made them a unique offer. He said he would send their pastor one hundred new one-dollar bills, to be distributed among the members and their friends, each to receive a single bill, which they were to invest for one year. The income from this dollar is to be brought in one year hence, and the one whose dollar has gained the most is to receive a prize of fifty dollars, the next thirty dollars. Each one is now taxing his inventive genius to the utmost, striving to make the most of his dollar, and when the money is turned over the church will have a jubilee. Some are out now planning all sorts of entertainments where they can spend just that dollar, to receive it back with the profits, though they are not supposed to ask any member of the church for any support. In this way they are interesting people outside of the church, which will doubtless have the influence of bringing them inside. One woman is using her dollar each week to buy materials with which she is making home-made crullers; another home-made cakes; another bread; some fancy work; others crocheting; and some are holding socials, and by the end of the year they expect to have a big sum of money collected, and a large number of new members to add to their church roll.

In a hundred cities, Hudson dealers have won the local records with the Super-Six.

Not in America only. In several countries Super-Sixes have won the hill-climbing records.

But the Pike's Peak climb last September was the world's supreme test. There twenty great cars, all specially built, met for a race to "the top of the world." And the Hudson Super-Six made the best time of all.

What They Drove

The Super-Six, remember, is a small, light Six. It doesn't win by size. It won these tests just as it won all other worth-while records—by endurance.

This invention—patented by Hudson—has minimized motor friction. It thus added 80 per cent to the motor's efficiency. It nearly doubled the motor's endurance.

You don't care to climb Pike's Peak at the speed the Super-Six showed it could do. You don't care to go 102 miles per hour, as a Super-Six stock chassis has done. Or 1819 miles in 24 hours, also with a stock chassis.

But you want the car which holds those records, if you buy a great car. Not because they prove capacity, but because they prove endurance—prove that no service you will ever demand will equal its capacity.

All-Round Ruler

But the Hudson is now more than monarch in performance. It is fully as distinctive in style and beauty this year, in finish, in equipment and in luxury. It has a new gasoline saver, in the form of radiator shutters, which, through controlling the heat of the motor in part, overcomes the disadvantages and waste of the present poor grade of gasoline. It has a patent pneumatic carburetor, exclusively Hudson, self-adjusting to every engine speed.

In whatever you prize most—performance, style, beauty or economy—you will find the Hudson leader. That's why it leads all other front-rank cars in sales.

A May-Time Breakfast
Make It a Reality

If an artist painted a May-time breakfast, the center dish would be berries.

But not berries alone. The berry dish is twice as dainty mixed with airy Puffed Grains.

Add sugar and cream to that mixture, and you have the finest dish in the world.

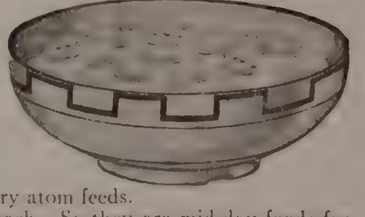
Flaky, Toasted Bubbles

These are whole grains of wheat and rice, puffed by steam explosions. Prof. A. P. Anderson invented the process to break up every food cell.

A fearful heat is applied for an hour, which gives a nut-like flavor. Then the grains are shot from guns. Every granule is exploded. And the grains come out like bubbles, puffed to eight times normal size.

The object is easy digestion. But the result is a food confection. Never was anything half so enticing made from these grains before.

Puffed Wheat   Puffed Rice
and Corn Puffs
Each 15c Except in Far West



May-Time Suppers

For luncheons and suppers millions of people serve them in bowls of milk. They form airy morsels, thin and flaky, with a toasted nut-like flavor.

They supply whole-grain foods, with their minerals and vitamines, of which few get enough. And in a form where every atom feeds.

In this form they do not tax the stomach. So they are mid-day foods for brain-workers, and bedtime foods for children. Serve them more frequently. There is nothing else like them. Keep all three kinds on hand.

Questions and Answers

R. T. S., Chicago, Ill. How can I reconcile Ps. 34 : 9, "Fear the Lord," with I John 4 : 18, "There is no fear in love." I have always loved God since my conversion, but I cannot seem to fear him.

The word "fear," as used in the Bible, has two distinct meanings—fear in the sense of dread or fright, and fear in the sense of reverence and sincere obedience. It is not easy to determine which meaning is intended, for the two Hebrew words most used have both meanings. In the New Testament, the Greek word used has more generally the sense of fright or dread. The whole message of the Bible is that what God most earnestly desires from men is their love; but sin keeps them from loving him, so he reveals to them, through conscience and through the law, the fearful results of sin. This awakens a fear which drives them to him for pardon and safety. A man who is living in sin, when his conscience is aroused, thinks of the power and the justice of God. After he is pardoned, he feels reverence for God and the beginnings of love for him. As he progresses in the Christian life all fear in the sense of terror, is removed. Throughout the Christian life reverence abides, but love grows more and more dominant. The wonderful word is "friendship." God wants us to be friends of his, as Abraham and Moses were; to serve him because we love him, to be glad in the gifts his love bestows. Christ would like to lead us all to the place where he can say to us, as he said to his disciples: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends" (John 15 : 15).

M. S., Demmore, W. Va. Does God ever tempt any one to do that which is not right in order to make them stronger soldiers, or to test their strength?

In I Cor. 10 : 13 and James 1 : 13 it is explicitly stated that while God may permit us to be tested, he is not the tempter, and that he tempts no man. The withdrawal of the Holy Spirit exposes us to temptation by leaving the heart open to the attack of the tempter, but nothing is more erroneous than to assume that temptation, or the placing of any agent in man's spiritual path which may cause him to fall, comes from God. God does not tempt us. Besides, we should not forget that temptation in itself is not a sin; the sin consists in yielding to temptation and encouraging it. It is not God who is the tempter, but the evil spirit in our own heart. If we ask divine help to resist temptation it will surely be granted.

C. R. D., Kennewick, Wash., writes: "I have noticed that the answer of the Allies to the Central Powers is sent by the governments of ten nations whose names are given at the beginning of their collective note. In Rev. 17 : 12–13, we read that 'the ten horns that thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet [at the time of the vision]; but they receive authority as kings, with the beast, for one hour. These have one mind, and they give their power and authority unto the beast'—the same beast which is pictured in Rev. 13 : 1–10. The ten governments of the collective note from the allied powers, and the ten kings of Rev. 17 : 13, may be only a coincidence. It may also be the beginning of the fulfilment of prophecies. Never before, so far, has anything happened in the world pointing as fully to a world-wide confederation of nations under one head, as described in Rev. 13 : 1–10, and prepared for in Rev. 17 : 13."

Subscriber, Santa Cruz, Calif. We must take the simple statement of Scripture as it stands. The very language Jesus employed was in itself a rebuke to idle curiosity.

C. C., Nashua, N. H., sends the following as another form of morning prayer:

"Now I get me up to work,
I pray the Lord I may not shirk;
If I should die before the night,
I pray the Lord my work's done right."

M. E. L., Edinburg, Ill. The support of an orphan in China at a mission school and orphanage is $20 a year, and the same in Africa. The Christian Herald has a number of orphans in China for whom we have no regular patrons, although we should be glad to have them assigned to patrons, where possible.

Reader, Cornwall Bridge, Conn. If matters be in the condition you represent, we suggest that you write Rev. Mr. Zartmann, Secretary of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, Winona Lake, Ind. There are doubtless good Christian people who could be interested in securing the services of an evangelist, and you may be able to get your own pastor to take the initiative. There are many communities in which the church and the world are so intermingled as to destroy the spiritual life of the people. They are given over to pleasure, dancing, card-playing, etc., and give little thought to the life to come, or to preparation for it here and now.

Mrs. A. E., Moscow, Idaho. Your answers to Anxious Soul, Bridgeport, and many others, do more good in the homes where the Christian Herald enters than you think, for they not only help those you answer, but they comfort all who forget God's promises and are like Job, who was tried and sorry. I know of one in Idaho who received happiness in Christ by reading a neighbor's Christian Herald.

Our special aim in the Mail-Bag is to make it serviceable to all who read it. We answer hundreds of letters that never appear in the paper, for the reason that they would not be of general interest.

J. G. T., Washington, D. C., twenty years a subscriber to the Christian Herald, writes. "It is well to see it prospering and doing God's work, especially in such a time as we now live in, filled with war and rumors of war. I hope and pray that it may bring to all its readers that spiritual Christianity which arouses men and women to a closer walk with God. We are here in this world, as in a school, to prepare for heaven, so let us be walking with God, guided heavenward by the Master himself Pray that the Kingdom of God may speedily come, and his will be done."

O. L. T., Greenfield, Ind. 1. Scripture distinctly tells us that none is perfect, save One—that is, God. It is our duty, however, to strive toward perfection, even as God is perfect—that is, to keep the divine perfection steadily in view as our model, the very desire for which will lift us out of the slough of worldliness and make us nobler and better. 2 Your other observation may be well founded, or it may be the reverse. None but the Searcher of hearts knows what lies beneath the surface of a man's life, nor how brave a struggle he may be making against circumstances of which we can have no knowledge.

Mrs. A. J., Berkshire, N. Y. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

C. E. D., Langford, S. D. There are questions raised occasionally in regard to religion which are purely speculative, and which, if discussed at all, would simply lead to unprofitable controversy. Those you have asked belong to this controversial class. No reasonable human being would undertake to fathom the mind of God, or trace his thoughts and purposes, or the range of his omnipotence and omniscience. "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways," we are told in the Scriptures (Isa. 55 : 8). Let us rather be willing to admit our human limitations and be content, like Paul, with the partial understanding to which we can attain here, believing as we must that that understanding will be enlarged hereafter. Life is a school with a divine teacher, and the whole universe to study. At our best, we can learn only a little here; and we should learn that little well, and not plume ourselves on knowing all things.

B. V. M., Salem, Mass., writes: "I think I have a match here in Massachusetts for your Korean woman (in a recent issue of the Christian Herald), who did not know her husband's name. I knocked at a door; a lady came; I said, 'I am making a business directory of the town, and need the name of this family.' She gave the surname; I asked the given name. She replied, 'Ed.' I said, 'That may mean Edwin, Edward or Edmund; which should I write?' She answered, 'I don't know; I haven't been married a great while.' At another time and place I asked the usual questions and received answers as usual. But the surname was anything but English, and I said: 'I'll have to let you spell it for me.' She replied, 'I don't spell it; John does.'"

C. W. P., Fairfield, Wash. The "Vinegar Bible," so called from the fact that, owing to an error in the heading of the 20th chapter of Luke, the parable of the vineyard was printed "Parable of the Vinegar," was issued in 1717 by the University of Oxford at their Clarendon Press. It was soon remedied, of course, but the name clung to it notwithstanding.

A subscriber in Lupton, Mich., writes to the Christian Herald regarding the adulteration of stock feeds with peanut shells, which it seems has grown to be a considerable industry. According to official analysis, the peanut shell contains even less nutrition than rice or wheat straw, which no intelligent farmer would feed to his stock except in case of a feed famine. Ground peanut shells give bulk to a cottonseed ration, but add no value, and this subscriber feels that farmers should be warned against such an adulteration.

Government Issues Warning

Against Fly Poisons

Following is an extract from "The Transmission of Disease by Flies," Supplement No. 29 to the Public Health Reports, April, 1916.

"Of other fly poisons mentioned mention should be made, merely for a purpose of condemnation, of those composed of arsenic. Fatal cases of poisoning of children through the use of such compounds are far too frequent, and owing to the resemblance of arsenical poisoning to summer diarrhea and cholera infantum, it is believed that the cases reported do not, by any means, comprise the total. Arsenical fly-destroying devices must be rated as extremely dangerous, and should never be used, even if other measures are not at hand."

106 fly poisoning cases have been reported by the press within the last three years. As stated above this number is but a fraction of the real number. Protect your children by using the safe, efficient, non-poisonous fly catcher

Jesus Welcomed As King

International Sunday School Lesson for April 29
John 12 : 12-26

One Day of Glad Recognition

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

DEAR to the Christian world is the story of Christ's one day of triumph, Palm Sunday. The church rejoices because even for one brief day he was hailed as a King.

It was the Sunday before the Passover. A great multitude were approaching Jerusalem on pilgrimage. Many were Galileans, and many of them believers in the Christ. On their part the demonstration was unpremeditated. They suddenly realized that the Messiah was entering the Holy City, and they began to sing snatches of the Messianic Psalms. In a few moments the stream of Passover visitors was transformed into the heralding procession of a conquering King.

A New Sort of Triumph

How different was this processional from the return in victory of Rome's generals! Here was a conquest of human hearts by acts of service, tenderness and care. Here was a Prince of Peace riding in the midst of his friends. Under the spell of that matchless personality rich Simon the Pharisee, outcast Zaccheus and the poorest Samaritan peasant could walk side by side. What a tribute to the character of Jesus that they could see, even for a day, the Anointed of God in the village Carpenter of Nazareth, the wandering Preacher of Galilee, the genuine Democrat who looked impartially on Dives and Lazarus, the Man who had not where to lay his head!

Jesus enjoyed their appreciation, though not for one moment did he overestimate its value. Jesus always prefers the "Amen Hallelujah" of the impulsive to the cold sarcasm of the cynical Pharisee. The great problem today, as then, is to combine warm enthusiasm with reasoned loyalty that will stand the practical tests of life. Too many of our rallies and revivals are as temporary in their effects as the zeal of these well-meaning Jews.

The Fickleness of the Crowd

Joyful acknowledgment was the instinctive reaction of the simple-hearted people of Jerusalem also when Jesus was seen. Yet these same people were easily molded by designing men to their own purposes. It is altogether likely that many who shouted "Hosanna" on Sunday cried out "Crucify him" on Thursday. That happens every week. People are not necessarily hypocrites because they go to church and sing hymns of praise to Christ on Sunday and then deny him during the week by their words and actions at business and in the streets.

We easily fall in with the prevailing note around us. It takes deep, earnest principle to resist. There are thousands of Americans who have been counseling calmness and humaneness for two years. Shall they now clamor for revenge and hatred? We ought still to ask ourselves how Jesus views the situation and what he would counsel us to do.

"Lo, the World Is Gone After Him"

Even the critics of Jesus were alarmed at the demonstration. But they were mistaken; the world had not taken up his real program at all. The world has not gone after him yet, though for two thousand years his "Follow me" has sounded more or less clearly above the jangled discords of human affairs.

Crowning Christ King was no such simple matter as the Galileans imagined. There were selfish interests to be overthrown. There was entrenched wrong in the church as well as in the state. They themselves completely failed to realize what Jesus meant by his efforts. To put him on a throne at Jerusalem was no part of his method at all. Their own hearts were not right.

You can't welcome the King without welcoming the kind of Kingdom that he stands for. They sang "Blessed is the Kingdom that cometh," but they thought it would be like David's. These things understood not even his disciples.

Jesus looks down upon us as we sing and wave our palms and says again, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

The Blindness of the Ruling Class

The most complete failure to accept the Son of God does not lie at the door of the ignorant multitudes. It lies as a heavy indictment upon the ruling class—the educated, the leaders of church and society. All they could see was their prerogatives invaded. All their anxiety was for the existing order, even Roman rule. "The chief priests therefore and the Pharisees gathered a council and said, What do we? for this man doeth many signs. If we let him alone all men will believe in him, and the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation."

In time of crisis the religious elect do not see! Think of the high authorities of the Church of England finding time in this year of sacrifice and darkness to censure Canon Henson for preaching in a Congregational church! How sadly Jesus must have shaken his head!

The Foregleams of a Deeper Appreciation

Jesus was more profoundly stirred by the report of the coming of Greeks desiring to see him than by all the shouts and palms of the multitude. The crowd wanted a kingdom that cometh with observation, with éclat, much palm-strewing and seats on the right hand and on the left. But these strangers from afar only said with reserve, "Sir, we would see Jesus." They had been attracted by reports of his teaching and spirit.

Jesus foresaw a great world-wide inquiry into the principles of his life. God in his own good time would build his Kingdom of consecrated souls. Those who hoped for a kingdom immediate, spectacular, secular, would put him to death. But the good seed would spring up everywhere, not only among Jews but among Gentiles, to the transformation of the earth.

The King's Throne a Cross

Palm Sunday heralded the King, but his throne was to be a cross. Jesus was a young man, apparently with his lifework before him. There seemed to be the beginning of response to his leadership. Yet he must die a shameful death or adopt the old doomed methods of politics and force. "Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour! But for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name."

He deliberately put aside the promise of Palm Sunday. Not in the shouting multitudes but in the inquiring Gentiles before the temple he saw the promise of victory. Not in the outward demonstrations but in the heart-hunger of humanity today he has his hope for a redeemed universe.

"We would see Jesus." The real Jesus, not the interpretation of him that is current or popular. We would learn of him. "Lord, what wouldst thou have us to do?"

"If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there also shall my servant be."

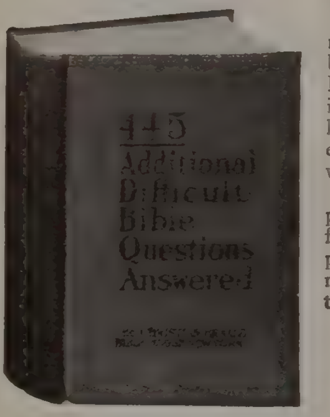
445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES



WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

THE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, D.D.

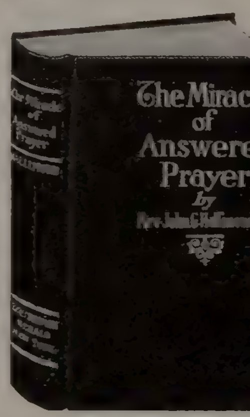
A Book With a Message for Every Soul

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

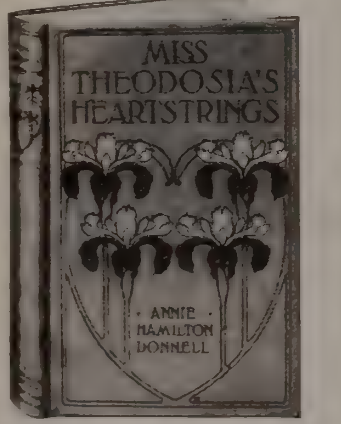
"The Miracle of Answered Prayer" should be in the hands of every Christian in America. The facts it sets forth furnish absolute evidence of the literal fulfillment of the Saviour's promise to his followers: "Whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name He will give it you." "Ask, and it shall be given you. . . ."

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.



THEODOSIA'S HEARTSTRINGS



IN this irresistible novel of happiness, Miss Theodosia Baxter wandered up and down the world for three years in search of something to interest her, only to come home and find it on the upper step of her own front porch. What she found was a very much surprised child who was holding a baby on the small area of her knees. They were two of the Flagg children who lived in the house next door—Evangeline the voluble and little Elly Precious, who possessed six toes. Ere long Miss Theodosia made the acquaintance of Stefena, the eldest of the Flagg children, and little deaf Carruthers. How this quartette of youngsters reached the heart of the staid and travel-worn woman and eventually brought a romance into her own life is set forth in Mrs. Donnell's characteristic style.

We will send a copy of "Miss Theodosia's Heartstrings," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Or, we will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

she did not have the money to pay for it.

"An account? What's that? That wouldn't make me have any more money, would it? Father was always talking about accounts—good ones and bad ones. He kept a store, you know. But I never knew what they were, exactly. What is an account? How can I get one?"

"Why, you give your orders as usual, but let the payment go until the end of the month," smiled the grocer. "We'll charge it—note it down, you know—then send the bill to your husband."

"And I won't have to ask him for any money?"

"Not to pay us."

"Oh, that would be just grand," she sighed longingly. "I'd like that. And it's something the way we're buying our furniture, isn't it?—installments?"

"Er—y-yes, only we send a bill for the entire month."

"And he pays it? Oh, I see. That's just grand! And he'd like it all right, wouldn't he?—because of course he'd have to pay some time, anyhow. And this way he wouldn't have to have me bothering him so much all the time asking for money. Oh, thank you. You're very kind. I think I will do that way if you don't mind."

"We shall be glad to have you, Mrs. Denby. So we'll call that settled. And now you can begin right away."

"And can I get those canned peaches and pears and plums, and the grape jelly that I first looked at?"

"Certainly—if you decide you want 'em," mumbled the grocer, throwing the last six words as a sop to his conscience.

"Oh, yes, I want 'em," averred Helen, her eager eyes sweeping the alluringly laden shelves before her. "I wanted them all the time, you know, only I didn't have enough money to pay for them. Now it'll be all right, because Burke'll pay—I mean Mr. Denby," she corrected with a conscious blush, suddenly remembering what her husband had said the night before about her calling him "Burke" to strangers.

Helen found she wanted not only the fruits and jelly, but several other cans of soups, meats, and vegetables. And it was such a comfort, for once, to select what she wanted, and not have to count up the money in her purse! She was radiantly happy when she went home from market that morning (instead of being tired and worried as was usually the case); and the glow on her face lasted all through the day and into the evening—so much so that even Burke must have noticed it, for he told her he did not know when he had seen her looking so pretty. And he gave her an extra kiss or two when he greeted her.

The second month of housekeeping proved to be a great improvement over the first. It was early in that month that Helen learned the joy and comfort of having "an account" at her grocer's. And she soon discovered that not yet had she probed this delight to its depths, for not only the grocer, but the fishman and the butcher were equally kind, and allowed her to open accounts with them. Coincident with this came the discovery that there were such institutions as bakeries and delicatessen shops, which seemed to have been designed especially to meet the needs of just such harassed little martyr housewives as she herself was; for in them one might buy bread and cakes and pies, and even salads and cold meats and fish-balls. One might, indeed, with these delectable organizations at hand, snap one's fingers at all the cookbooks in the world—cookbooks that so miserably failed to cook!

The baker and the little Dutch delicatessen man, too (when they found out who she was), expressed themselves as delighted to open an account; and with the disagreeable necessity eliminated of paying on the spot for what one ordered, and with so great an assortment of ready-to-eat foods to select from, Helen found her meal-getting that second month a much simpler matter.

Then, too, Helen was much happier now that she did not have to ask her husband for money. She accepted what he gave her, and thanked him; but she said nothing about her new method of finance.

"I'm going to keep it secret till the stores send him the bills," said Helen to herself. "Then I'll show him what a lot I've saved from what he has given me."

She only smiled, therefore, enigmatically, when he said one day, as he passed over the money —

"Oh! I quite forgot! You must be getting low. But I'm glad you didn't have to ask me for it, anyhow!"

Helen was meaning to be very economical these days. When she went to market she always saw several things she would have liked, that she did not get, for of course she wanted to make the bills as small as she could. Naturally Burke would wish her to do that. She tried to save, too, a good deal of the money Burke gave her; but that was not always possible, for there were her own personal expenses. True, she did not need many clothes—but she was able to pick up a few bargains in bows and collars (one always needed fresh neckwear, of course); and she found some lovely silk stockings, too, that were very cheap, so she bought several pairs—to save money. And of course there were always car-fares and a soda now and then, or a little candy.

There were the "movies," too. She had fallen into the way of going rather frequently to the Empire with her neighbor on the same floor. It did her good, and got her out of herself. (She had read only recently how every wife should have some recreation; it was a duty she owed herself and her husband—to keep herself youthful and attractive.) She got lonesome and nervous, sitting at home all day; and now that she had systematized her housekeeping so beautifully by buying almost everything all cooked, she had plenty of leisure. Of course she would have preferred to go to the Olympia Theater. They had a stock company there, and real plays. But their cheapest seats were twenty-five cents, while she might go to the Empire for ten. So very bravely she put aside her expensive longings, and chose the better part—economy and the movies. Besides, Mrs. Jones, the neighbor on the same floor, said that, for her part, she liked the movies the best.

No matter where Helen went in the afternoon, she was always very careful to be at home before Burke. She hoped she knew what pertained to being a perfect wife better than to be careless about matters like that! Mrs. Jones was not always so particular in regard to her husband—which only served to give Helen a pleasant, warm little feeling of superiority at the difference.

Perhaps Mrs. Jones detected the superiority, for sometimes she laughed, and said:—

"All right, we'll go if you must; but you'll soon get over it. This lovey-dovey-I'm-right-here-hubby business is all very well for a while, but—you wait!"

"All right, I'm waiting. But—you see!" Helen always laughed back.

Hurrying home from shopping or the theater, therefore, Helen always stopped and got her potato salad and cold meat, or whatever else she needed. And the meal was invariably on the table before Burke's key sounded in the lock.

Helen was, indeed, feeling quite as if she were beginning to realize her vision now. Was she not each night the loving, daintily gowned wife welcoming her husband to a well-ordered, attractive home? There was even quite frequently a bouquet of flowers on the dinner table.

After dinner there was the long evening together. Sometimes they went to walk, after the dishes were done—Burke had learned to dry dishes beautifully. More often they stayed at home and played games, or read. Sometimes they just talked, laying wonderful plans about the fine new house they were going to build. Now that Helen did not have to ask Burke for money there did not seem to be so many occasions when he was fretful and nervous; and they were much happier together.

All things considered, therefore, Helen felt, indeed, before this second month of housekeeping was over, that she had now "got things nicely to running."

captures the British considerably strengthened their position in front of St. Quentin. The same day, at the northern end of their line, the British advanced on a line extending from just north of the railroad from Arras to Marquion, and captured, after a stiff fight, the town of Croisilles on the north of the railroad, around which there has been much fighting lately. This position they held against a strong German counter-attack.

In the center of their line other villages were taken, but these captures were in the nature of operations consolidating positions. The next day the British again improved their St. Quentin position by capturing Maissemy, a place a little northeast of Francilly. Five miles to the east of Arras, Henin-sur-Cojeul was also taken after a rather warm fight.

The French portion of the line from St. Quentin south to the Aisne, divides itself topographically into three divisions: First, the front between St. Quentin and La Fere; second, that between La Fere and the Ailette River; and the third that between the Ailette and the Aisne Rivers. The earlier days of the first week of April, there was little fighting in the first division of this French front, but about the middle of the week hard fighting began and continued for three days, and resulted in the French forcing their line a considerable distance to the eastward, this advance resulting in the most important gain strategically the French have so far made in the fighting on the Arras-Craonne line, by the capture of the villages of Grugies, Urvilliers and Moy, particularly of the last named. Grugies is located only a short distance south of St. Quentin, in fact, may be called a suburb of that town; - Urvilliers is a little to the southeast, and Moy is much more to the southeast of Urvilliers, on a short branch of the railroad running from St. Quentin to La Fere, and only a mile and a half to the west of such railroad. This movement, therefore, has no great distance to drive forward to cut communications between these two towns and completely invest the one on the south and the other on the north. On the whole, the present situation between St. Quentin and La Fere looks serious for the Teutons.

There are some observers, General Maurice of the British war office among them, who say that St. Quentin is not part of the so-called "Hindenburg front" on this line, and that its taking by the Allies will not mean the breaking of the German line. Apparently the British war office expects much harder fighting on the British portion of the line a little later, judging from the general tone of General Maurice's statements.

At the end of the week the Germans took an inning and made a considerable gain in the region north of Rheims, in Champagne, capturing 800 French, besides some artillery, in addition to the ground won. The Germans also claim to have inflicted losses in casualties on the French. The French bulletin locates this attack on the front extending from Sapigeul to the Godat Farm, a distance of about one and three-eighths miles, and admits a partial German success. Counter-attacks by the French are proceeding for the recovery of the lost ground as this record closes.

On the Russian front the only important incident took place on the Stochod River, northwest of Lutsk, near the village of Holenin. Here the Teutons made a sudden attack on the Russians on the western bank of the river, practically wiping out two regiments. The Germans pursued them for four or five miles, held all the newly won ground, and took about 900 prisoners.

The Germans report the sinking of an additional 90,000 tons by submarines. This, according to the Germans, brings the sinkings for February and March up to 1,355,000 tons. Lord Beresford made a statement in the House of Lords a few days ago, that the total of British ships sunk for these two months up to March 25 aggregated over 920,000 tons.

The arrivals and departures from British ports remained about the same as the previous weeks. This report only includes British vessels in the war zone around the British Isles.

On Monday Mr. Bonar Law, in the British House of Commons, apparently inspired by the Turkish claims that 3,000 British were killed in the recent battle near Gaza, Palestine, made the statement that the British had won a complete victory and that their killed, in place of numbering 3,000, only numbered 400 or less.

In Mesopotamia the British have made further advances to the north of Bagdad, while the Russians moving south in Persia have occupied Kanikin on the frontier between Persia and Mesopotamia. Russian cavalry detachments are said to be in contact with the British forces south of Kanikin.

Miller
GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD
TIRES
PRODUCE MILEAGE

It will pay you to keep in mind the difference between mere "tire production and productive tires." You can profit by tire productiveness. You can't cash in on production.

A production tire is but one of a huge quantity. One picked at random from the output of a frenzied day's work. A unit which has helped swell the big output by one.

Do you believe such a product can give you mileage? Can service and satisfaction be put into a tire when all effort is concentrated on the number produced?

WE COULD SPEED UP AND BUILD MORE MILLER TIRES!

They could be thrown into the vulcanizing pits,—the steam jammed on; they could be jerked out again, and their appearance wouldn't be marred a bit. But the natural vegetable wax and oil in the fabric might be burned out, might be carbonized, leaving a lifeless tire incapable of standing up against punishment.

The Miller plan of building fewer tires makes each one a representative Miller. It explains the satisfaction motorists receive from them.

Here are the instructions given to all Miller tire builders:

"You must build this tire as tho it were the only one you have to make. Think of it as tho it was for use on your car. Concentrate all your ability, knowledge and skill on this one. If poorly built it may destroy the reputation earned by a hundred perfect ones."

"This tire must be perfect before you build another. If you see a flaw in any material, discard it."

"Don't rush—take your time. Until you finish this one, forget you have others to build. At the same time, do not waste time or material. That increases cost without bettering the product."

Do you wonder that being built under such instructions MILLER "GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD" TIRES have established a reputation both for productiveness and uniformity of service? They don't vary. All produce the fundamental thing for which they were built—mileage.

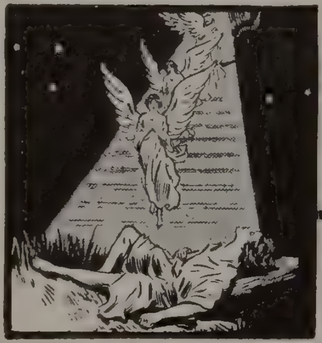
A PLAIN PATH TO THE BIBLE

An Example of How Interestingly You Will Compete in the $5,628 Cash Second Bible Picture Study

FIRST

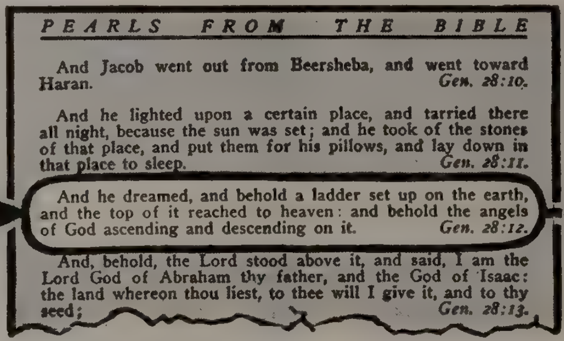
You will study the pictures carefully, noting the scene and action each one seems to portray.



An Example Picture

SECOND

You will open "Pearls from the Bible," and select from among its short list of verses those that fit the pictures best.



PEARLS FROM THE BIBLE

And Jacob went out from Beersheba, and went toward Haran. Gen. 28:10.

And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. Gen. 28:11.

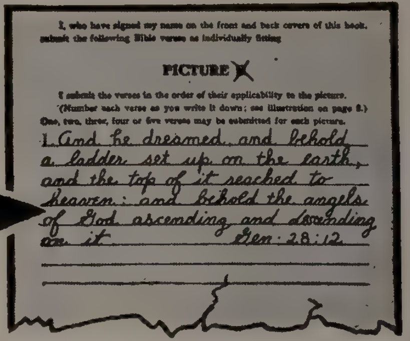
And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen. 28:12.

And, behold, the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; Gen. 28:13.

Portion of "Pearls from the Bible"

THIRD

You will write your selected verses in the Answer Book, and send it in as directed.



I, who have signed my name on the front and back covers of this book, submit the following Bible verses as individually fitting

PICTURE X

I submit the verses in the order of their applicability to the picture.

(Number each verse as you write it down; see illustration on page 8.)

One, two, three, four or five verses may be submitted for each picture.

1. And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen: 28:12.

Section of Answer Book

IN fitting best verses to the pictures you will become absorbed in this delightful way of increasing your Bible knowledge.

You will be learning, part by part, the beautiful stories of the Bible.

The pictures themselves tell but parts of the stories; when the verses best describing the pictures are found and fitted to them the stories are complete.

Perhaps you are not yet competing in this entrancing verse-choosing competition? You may compete without expense, as explained in the rules, which are sent free of charge. Read every word of this announcement—then act!

In order to give participants a tangible goal toward which to strive, and to provide an extra incentive, the Christian Herald will award $5,628.00 in cash, divided into 1,000 separate sums, to those who submit the lists of verses that BEST fit the pictures.

Any one is eligible to compete; all are upon an equal footing. Common sense in selecting the best verses will gain the rewards. Those who win will do so only through the use of good judgment. The verses from which to choose are but 2,000 in all, and any one can quickly run through them. Selecting the best will be the test. The Bible student can have no final advantage over a person who boasts no Bible knowledge. Yet what Bible knowledge the Picture Study will pleasantly impart!

Bible House Where Once Was Saloon

"BIBLE HOUSE." The words look unreal to the people in the city of Lynn, Massachusetts, for they gleam out in bold white enamel letters from the door of what was formerly one of the most prominent "corner saloons" of the world-famed shoe city. The transformation is truly unique, for within the very walls where once drunkenness and degradation reigned, the Word of God is preached, and Bibles and other religious books and current religious literature are now sold.

The store, which is on Andrew street, one of the main thoroughfares, was a typical barroom with large plate glass windows and a high bar. When Lynn was forced into the "dry" ranks by the decision of its voters, the brewery interests firmly refused to give up the store to other business ventures, but held it vacant each year, awaiting the return of the city to the "wet forces." Consequently it was a big surprise when a few weeks ago, it was announced that the store had been leased for a Bible House.

The conversion of abandoned churches into moving-picture houses is not unheard of, neither is the use of summer Gospel tents for dancing pavilions unknown; but the development of a saloon into a Bible House is probably without precedent.

Not the least important feature of the place is the noonday Gospel meeting where the tired men and women from the factories, the shops, and offices, gather for 15 or 20 minutes, or longer if convenient, to listen to a short talk by a minister from one of the local churches. An excellent musical program is furnished which pleases the weary ones. In the afternoon, the Bible House extends a cordial invitation to shoppers to stop and rest awhile within its comfortable quarters. An air of refreshing calm hovers over the place, and it has a decided home-like atmosphere.

The Bible House in Lynn merely demonstrates anew the certain benefits that always follow when the Word of God displaces the open saloon. In place of destruction comes inspiration, in place of disorder, comfort, and in place of broken homes, rebuilt hearths and reborn lives.

Young People's Topics for April 29

Missionary Opportunities in Latin America

Christian Endeavor Topic. Isa. 60 : 1-5

LATIN America more than any other unevangelized field is now a land of opportunity. There is an evident readiness everywhere to hear the truth and a hearty welcome both for the preacher and the teacher. There is a need almost as wide as the continent and an imperative necessity for immediate action. The conditions in South America were very fully treated in the Epworth League topic in the Christian Herald of March 14, and by Clayton Sedgewick Cooper in "Latin America's Need" in the same number.

The Need for Training

B. Y. P. U. Topic (Conquest Meeting) II Tim. 2 : 20-26

TRAINING is as necessary for Christian work as for any other human activity. Even under the pressure of great need, European nations are taking a year to make a soldier. Under our American school system, twelve years of training are provided for each citizen before the country is ready to encourage him to enter the field of trade and commerce. And for the learned professions an additional schooling, sometimes reaching to ten years, is required before the individual is held to be fully trained. Similarly, long and arduous training is necessary if we would do worth-while work for the Master. Our spiritual muscles must be exercised until we are certain that they will not fail us in the moment of need. The person who fits himself for a business career must be prepared to begin at the bottom and work up. Even so, the Christian must be ready for any task that circumstances may place before him. There are three great branches of training for Christian work, the reading of the Word, prayer, and service. Nothing is menial which is done for Christ. Our pride needs to be consecrated as much as our will, and we must be ready to do the thing which is present in our hands, trusting in Christ to bring both us and it to perfection, and to turn it to his glory.

Symmetrical vs. Lopsided Development

Epworth League Topic. I Cor 12 : 12-21

SYMMETRY and perfect balance are one. Sometimes Christians who are seriously out of balance are led to believe that they are choice vessels of grace merely because they are peculiar; but as a matter of fact they are only lopsided, and need to be held up with the props of adulation and compliment and deference and constant recognition. The Spirit gives individual Christians different abilities, because many things are needful for the smooth working of the plan of salvation, and each peculiar gift is valuable only in its relation to the others. Paul even emphasized that preaching was of little value without hearers, and that some might be gifted as hearers even as others were gifted in the presentation of the message. All of us can be useful if we are willing to place our talents and our time upon the altar of service to be used unquestioningly as the Spirit may direct. If that is our attitude of mind there is little danger that we will grow spiritually lopsided, and there is every chance that we will grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord, developing a truly symmetrical Christian character.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

"HEAR the right, O Lord, attend unto my cry, give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips. Let my sentence come forth from thy presence; let thine eyes behold the things that are equal."

This prayer of David might well be the prayer of America today. We can pray to God that he will hear the right, and that the answer to our prayers may come forth from his presence. In every nation there are those who love God sincerely and pray with open minds for justice and right. May it not be that those in every nation who are able to love God enough to love their neighbor as themselves, and to include among their neighbors even those in arms against them—may it not be that these will be the force which will finally bring the consciences of nations to that state which will make peace possible? The Prayer League cannot pray more worthily than that the power of this nation in arms may ever remain a power for the right and for justice, and that the world conflict may reach its final triumph in a Christian peace.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Pe Ell, Wash.; Oil City, Pa.; Westplains, Mo.; Greensboro, Vt.; Hammond, Ind.; Columbus, Mont.; Scituate, R. I.; Jerseyville, Ill.; Malvern, Ark. (that many may be saved during revival here); Spencer, W. Va. ("that many may be saved during revival here"); Mount Carroll, Ill. (that many may be saved during revival); York, Neb. (that many souls may be saved during revival); Utica, Pa. (at the Reynolds Church); Norfolk, Va. ("pray for the success of Billy Sunday's campaign in New York"); Keefeton, Okla. ("pray for the unsaved in the service of our country").

Mrs. R. R. Greensboro, Vt., and Mrs. C. A. K., Kansas City, Mo., each asks prayer ("that a pastor may be sent to our church").

Mrs. L. M. K. asks prayer that husband's mind may be restored; five friends, that minds may be strengthened; six friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for friends or relatives.

Mrs. L. D. Y. asks prayer that cataracts on eyes may be removed; three friends, that their mothers' sight may be restored; Mrs. W. A. R., that a missionary's sight may be restored; twelve friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

Fifty-one friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; a Troubled Sister, that husband may be cured of the habit; seven, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Sixteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; nine wives, their husbands, including Mrs. E. W. P., that husband may be saved and become reconciled to her; forty-six, for other relatives or friends.

Eleven readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Seventy-four ask prayer for the healing of friends and relatives, including A. B., that a child's speech may be restored; another, Mrs. O. S., that a friend may be healed of cancer without the use of a knife; another, Mrs. S., that son may be healed without an operation; another, A. L. C., that a sister may pass safely through an operation; six friends, ask prayer for the restoration of hearing for themselves or others; fifty-seven friends for healing for themselves.

Twenty-seven friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Twenty-six friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including Mrs. A. M. S., that all warring nations may have peace

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. J. H. D., Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. M. G. W., Alton, Ind.; Mrs. F. H. B., Lebanon, Mo.; C. B. M., Hensel, Pa.; Mrs. G. W. S., Sandusky, Ohio; Mrs. A. M. S., Wolcott, N. THE man who is responsible for a system by which the world enjoys safer, easier, quicker and cheaper transportation, is a determining factor in progress.

When George Stephenson started the first locomotive on its way he pushed the world forward centuries. Today we see the automobile with all its possibilities made practical and its energy made effective by the rubber tire.

The leading example of highly specialized and efficient tire service is found in Firestone Non-Skid Tires. The miles of reliable wear on any road at all seasons, the car-protection and easy-riding, make Firestone Tires a world-wonder in transportation.

And as there is a man-power behind every big work, so this service is vitalized and given the personal element by the name on every tire of the founder and present head of the business, Mr. Firestone. That name on the tire is your assurance of quality.

Your dealer can get Firestones for you, and this quality will cost you no more than ordinary tires. Because Firestone Tires are widespread in use and the output is tremendous and efficiently handled by the Firestone Organization. Your dealer will serve you.

To lighten this work: Let Gold Dust dissolve the grease

Just think!

You spend about 45 days a year at it!

A woman who has to wash the family dishes tells us she figures that nearly 20 minutes for each meal means 45 eight-hour days a year on just this one part of woman's work.

That is a great deal of time for a woman to spend in so uncreative a work as dishwashing.

Most women know that grease makes the work in dishwashing. And millions of women have found that the grease comes off very quickly when Gold Dust is used—a tablespoonful to the dishpan of water.

By all means use Gold Dust in your dishwater. See how much it helps.

Billy Sunday Gets Under Way

“GOD has the power, you have the message; it is up to New York.” Thus read one of a number of telegrams Billy Sunday received from cities in which he had worked, which was read at the opening of the first meeting of the Sunday campaign. The great audience of ministers and church-members and well-wishers and a few spectators, by their applause, gave evidence of the accepted challenge.

Billy Sunday is not exactly a stranger to New York, having appeared several times for single addresses since he became an evangelist, and having appeared frequently during his baseball days at the old polo grounds. Neither are New Yorkers entire strangers to the mannerisms of speech and action of Mr. Sunday. Newspaper reports of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Boston campaigns, accompanied as they had been by sketches and photographs, had prepared New York for the form in which Mr. Sunday presented his message. But expectation is never the same as realization, and it was evident that the tabernacle crowds of the first Sunday were being agreeably surprised, and were getting, to use commercial terms, according to Mr. Sunday's style, more than their money's worth.

Those who came to “see a circus” and to watch Mr. Sunday “do stunts” found him as active as they had anticipated. Those who had come to hear the Gospel preached in a little different way heard a message that warmed their hearts and sent them out from the tabernacle determined to be a little bit more efficient soldiers of the King. And those who just came went away determined to come again.

THE tabernacle is a tremendously big place. Its bigness is demonstrated at every service by Mr. Rodeheaver's favorite practice of asking parts of the congregation to sing portions of songs. He will ask the choir to sing the first phrase of the chorus, and the last ten rows of the tabernacle to sing the next phrase. But while the ten rows are waiting for the sound of the choir's last note to reach them, and the choir are waiting for the sound of the first note of the congregation to come back, there is a perceptible interval of silence.

Each service begins with songs by the great chorus, but before a song is sung Mr. Rodeheaver or some minister upon whom he calls offers prayer that the service of music may be blessed in the hearts of men and women, that God may use the song as well as the sermon for the regeneration of souls. There is no formality in the services. Mr. Rodeheaver, or “Rody” as he is familiarly called, chooses first an old hymn, then a tune that starts every unregenerated foot into rhythmic motion. He plays audience and choir against each other in antiphonal singing. He gets them warmed up and enthusiastic and ready, then he steps aside and Mr. Sunday takes the reins, makes his announcements and calls for the collection, always explaining that the collection is taken to pay the debts of the New York association and that when the necessary expenses have been covered the collections will cease. He does not say, “The ushers will now wait upon you for your offering,” but he says, “Go to it, boys, get all they've got,” and the audience reaches for its pocket in a frantic effort, not to protect the contents, but to find a really worthy offering for the great cause in which New York is engaged.

ON Monday, April 9, Mr. Sunday met the ministers of the cooperating churches at the Marble Collegiate Church and introduced them to the members of his party. He and his helpers told the ministers that they had come to New York in answer to their call, and that they had come to lead; that they had come to remedy an undesirable condition in the religious life of the city, and that they intended to go to work in their own way, working like any other consulting specialist, according to their own approved and tested methods. Mr. Sunday said: “On some things you may disagree with me, just as I will disagree with you on some of your methods; but I'll have grace enough to keep quiet, and I hope you will do the same. You can't win in religion without hard work. You can't grow a crop lying in the field under the shade of a tree, sipping lemonade through a straw and saying, ‘Oh, ain't it hot?’ All the suggestions we have to offer about the conduct of an evangelistic campaign have been forged on the anvil of experience, and that beats your theory a block.”

On Tuesday Mr. Sunday preached two sermons from the same text, Habakkuk 3 : 2, the two sermons being a progressive demonstration of the necessity of revivals to religious and national life. As is usual in every campaign, he was inclined to give the first week or ten days to the inspiration of church members and the preparation of the community for the drive against unrepentant sin, for which the campaign was inaugurated. No calls for trail-hitters were made in the first week.

Mr. Sunday might be described as an amimated epigram. His sermons are epigrammatical in the extreme. He fires truths at his hearers in sharp volleys of high explosive statement. In his first address on Sunday afternoon, Mr. Sunday took occasion to renew his frequently expressed declaration of war on the liquor traffic, which he termed the “damnable, hellish, vile, corrupt, iniquitous liquor business.” He said: “My life has been threatened from one end of the city to the other. This God-forsaken whisky gang is the worst this side of hell. They offered money to the editor of one of the biggest papers in New York to print their dirty lies about me. He is a church member, too. Then they went to Dr. Haldeman of the First Baptist Church and offered him a sum that would make him rich if he would ‘knock’ these meetings. They want to get every preacher and priest to ‘knock’ me. They have raised, I understand, $500,000 to ‘get’ me. I say to them ‘Come on, you God-forsaken, weasel-eyed, white-livered, black-hearted gang of thugs; come on. I defy you.’ I have put them out of $200,000,000 worth of business. I ask no quarter from the dirty bunch, and I give them none—absolutely none.”

HERE are just a few of the direct hits of the Sunday artillery:

“The society woman decked in diamonds until she scintillates like the milky way has her troubles just as much as the woman who manicures her finger-nails on the washboard. All are groping after God. I bring you nothing new. I am an old-fashioned preacher of the old-time religion. If you don't want the Gospel of Jesus Christ, take a tip from me and don't poke your head in around here.”

“I want to say to New York right on the kick-off, I believe the Bible is the Word of God from cover to cover.”

“Hell is seldom preached nowadays, and that's the reason there is so much hell on earth. I don't believe in Gehenna or Hades. I believe in H-E-L-L, hell."

"I try to be all things to all people that I may win some people to God. If I don't stick to my text, I stick to my crowd."

"Revival does two things: first, it returns the church from her backsliding; and second, it causes the conversion of men and women, and it always includes the conviction of sin on the part of the church."

"When the church of God stops voting for the saloon, the saloon will go to hell."

"The old world needs a baptism of the old-time religion."

"There are two crowds in every church—the ruts and the anti-ruts. The only difference between the rut and the grave is that the rut is longer."

"The promises of God are in the present tense."

"Revival is normal and the history of the church is a history of revivals. The prophets were all revivalists."

"Everywhere Paul went, he either had a riot or a revival."

"If the preachers would stop fighting theological sham battles and go to fighting the devil, we would have the greatest revival in the history of the world."

"You can't scald a hog in ice water."

Commending the governor of New York for his earnest advocacy of the local option bill under consideration in the Assembly of the state of New York, Billy Sunday expressed the hope that the coming of local option would soon be followed by the driving of the saloon out of New York City. He said:

"I hope old Manhattan will vote so dry that you will have to prime a man before he can spit."

"Some of the churches today are full of sour-faced old religious crabapples who are trying to hand God a lemon."

"Don't expect me to win this revival for you all alone any more than you would expect the President to win this war all alone. You get out and do your part; he'll do his."

"Some people are so tight that if you asked them to sing 'Old Hundred' they would sing 'The Ninety and Nine,' and save one per cent.!"

Billy Sunday's Call to Youth

A Sermon Preached in the Big New York Tabernacle*

Copyright, William A. Sunday

AT the time of President McKinley's funeral procession, this country for five minutes stopped all work. The railroads, every factory, the machinery of this land stood still; the banker stopped counting his money; the merchant quit measuring the commodities and left them unmeasured; the farmer stopped his plow in the furrow; every student closed his book for five minutes, and with uncovered heads we all attempted to pay a mark of respect and tribute to the man who had tried to make this a better nation.

Seventy-five million people in the United States, each giving five minutes, would make over 700 years of service rendered McKinley. I am glad we did it. I am glad there is a Fourth of July, when we uncoil our enthusiasm and testify to the world that we realize at what cost we laid the foundation of the greatest nation God's eyes ever rested upon.

I am glad there is an Easter to recall Him that burst through the bonds of death; I am glad we have Christmas to recall Him that was born amidst the malodorous beasts in the manger to save us, if we are men and women enough to accept Him.

I am glad there is a Labor Day to pay tribute to the man with the dinner bucket and calloused hand. I am glad we have a Thanksgiving Day, when we all journey back home, and eat turkey and cranberry sauce and mince pie. As a nation, we can raise enough to feed the world.

You are big or little, not according to avoirdupois, but according to where you are. How many opportunities to develop yourselves physically and morally and to make good you pass up because you are too lazy to do anything except make yourself fit to be one of the crowd? Now, young folks, I want to tell you something in the hope that I can induce you to write your lives in italics.

I hold that the boy who goes to school is bigger than the young lobster that loafs in the streets, smokes cigarettes, goes into the back door of grog shops and tries to drink the whole bunch under the table. It is bigger to pray than it is to blaspheme; it is bigger to pray than it is to be that little scoundrel that walks the streets sneering at religion. It is bigger to sit in a church than to line up with the bunch at some bar.

We have the greatest nation in the universe and the greatest opportunities to become something in all the world, and if you can't become something, you are a mutt, a molly-coddle, excess baggage and nothing but a mere cipher.

This element in us; this hope for something better is nature clearing the ground. That is why the young man goes West. He is tired of being a molehill and wants to be a mountain. Not to grow up, not to get bigger is to bring on yourself the contempt of those who do grow. A midget in body can be turned into financial account in a dime museum.

A midget in mind and a midget in character is like a carbuncle. Peel off your coat, sell it and buy a sword and go out in the world's strife and drive the sword to the hilt in the putrified and foul-smelling evils of the world.

There are not enough men in the world willing to take off their coats and fight for Christ. But I'll fight for Him, and I'll fight hell in New York if I have to do it alone. But I know I've got you back of me.

They say of a man, he is dead. Is he? What complaint caused his death? No complaint, they say of him. Everybody is satisfied. Some people leave the world, and all that's left is their epitaph on the tombstone.

Some fellow says he will never get married, but when he meets the right girl, when some girl crosses his path; some girl with eyes like a raven, hair like the midnight, teeth like pearls behind lips of coral; he will fall dead in love with her, and if some young fellow don't cut him out, in six months he will be looking for a flat, and in less than a year he will be tacking down carpets and hanging pictures. When desire comes, men will build a tunnel through any mountain that impedes progress in this world.

You ask a tack in a keg of nails how he feels. He would say, I am not going to continue to be a tack; I am going to become as big as the biggest spike in the keg. How can I become it?

By going with people bigger than yourself. Go to college, read good books. Grow and develop and become something in this old world. When a boy drinks, swears, blasphemes, sneers at religion, it is simply because he is going with company that makes him do it or his lobster of a father swears in his hearing.

If you find a man on top of the hills in this world's conflict, you can make up your mind he did not alight there; he had to climb. There are five things you need to make a ladder upon which to climb: First, blood; second, environment; third, sand; fourth, education, and, above all, you need Christianity, if you want to be on top of this heap. You can dispense with all but the last.

Daniel Webster's parents wanted him to be a farmer. In those days they had to cut grain with a scythe, or, as they called it, a cradle, and his father was one of the best cradle setters in the country. He was an expert and Daniel tried to follow him but he said: "Father, this cradle don't hang right," and his father said: "If it don't hang right, then hang it yourself," and Daniel walked over and hung it on the limb of a tree.

Oliver Cromwell was a farmer at the age of 42. General Grant was tanning hides in Illinois when he was 36 years old. So they failed in a good many callings before they got on the right track.

Study your capabilities; find out what you are going to do. If God wants you to be an iron cogwheel in a machine the sooner you stop being a searchlight and a whistle and be a cogwheel, the better the machine will work and the more successful you will be.

It is the false ideals that strew the shores with wrecks, eagerness to achieve success in realms we cannot reach that breeds half the ills that curse today.

One great barrier is ignorance. Your size depends upon your mind, not your muscles. You can't measure manhood with a tape line around his biceps; you can't determine success by the cash register or the rating in Bradstreet or R. G. Dun.

Success depends upon the mind, not the muscle. The engineer is bigger than the engine he runs; the captain is bigger than the ship. Two electric dynamos no bigger than my two fists can do more work than a 12-foot windmill in a 60-foot tower from which you can see five miles away. You can measure a rose in size; that's easy; but fragrance, that's an impossibility.

Manhood and womanhood do not depend on muscle. Apparent size is one thing; real size is another. If you don't believe it, try to stop a hornet with the end of your nose when he is going a mile a minute.

Size is not the thing that puts the ball over the fence or reaches the home base. Not on your life! You know a plant grows by taking from the air and sunshine and ground that which it needs to build itself up and grow and develop. The farmers of this country are learning that it pays to raise corn at so much a bushel, feed it to cattle and sell the beef at so much per pound.

A good, manly, God-fearing, sober young man is worth more than a cursing, beer-soaked, cigarette-smoking little fiend that walks up and down our streets. I hold it is better to feed our boys and girls schools, colleges and churches than to feed them gambling, grog-shops and the institutions that draw them under.

Aniline dyes are made out of pine tar. Cigarettes are made out of the cigar stumps they fish out of the gutter. Listen to me, boys. They will go up a back alley and they will pick up a dirty rag that a billy goat would pass up like a pay car does a tramp, and they will turn that dirty rag into glucose, they will turn the glucose into booze, and they will turn the booze into young men, and turn the young man into the penitentiary or the electric chair, or put his head in a noose and send him into a premature grave.

I will tell you what is the matter with you fellows. You would rather wear a clean shirt or white shirt and patent leather shoes and work for $4 or $5 a week and call it a salary, than you would to put on a pair of overalls and a hickory shirt or a flannel shirt and take a dinner bucket and work for $25 a week and call it wages. As a result, our boys hang around the cities and 98 per cent. of our criminals come from our cities.

Do your best, and you will never wear out shoe leather looking for a job. Do your best, and you will never become blind reading help-want ads in a newspaper. Be like the fellow that went to college and tacked the letter V up over the door of his room. He was asked what that stood for and he said "Valedictorian," and he went out carrying the valedictory with him.

You can tell a young man's size by what he is overcoming. Those who borrow trouble never get a chance to pay it back. Remember that.

I can tell a man's size by what he is doing. I know the size of the man who stole an umbrella, the same as if I measured him for a suit of clothes.

Be a live wire. Have some blood in your veins, not pink tea. A lot of you young fellows need vim, ginger, tabasco sauce and paprika. Be like the man with the itch. Make everybody scratch if they get near you. Don't be a milk-and-water sop.

It takes more than a mortar-board hat, a diploma, a "frat" pin and a rah, rah, rah to make a man.

JAPAN'S FOREMOST CHRISTIAN SCHOOL

BY MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

ONE of the greatest opportunities for good in Japan is through the printed Word. Great because in Japan nearly every one can read, and because intellectual curiosity and alertness give Christian thought entrance through literature into many minds, which would be unreached by preaching. Three great religions, Buddhism, Shintoism and Confucianism, are continually interesting the young men of the empire. The trouble is to find a working philosophy that will make it possible for them to have faith and hope in something eternal, while change and decay are going on in the old social order in which their fathers were reared.

The Christian Literature Society in Japan is a remarkable organization. It is probably the most closely unionized Christian organization in Japan. It published nearly 32,000,000 pages of Christian literature last year. Its executive secretary, Dr. Wainright, is a man of unusual ability. But the power it exerts and will exert rests more upon the eagerness of the Japanese for knowledge and the ability of the Japanese people to read, than upon the union of more than a score of missions in its support, or the executive and literary ability of its conductors. The question now is, "What has Christianity in England and America to offer to Japan in this crisis?" Christian scholarship the world over is called to help the eager Japanese to a rational belief—to win Japan from the realism of the Russians, French and Italians, to the knowledge of Christ.

I ASKED many Christian educators in Japan, "What excuse is there for Christian schools in Japan, where the scholarship of the government schools is so good?" There was almost always the same reply: "The type of men Christian schools produce." This testimony came not alone from Christians but from Buddhists, Confucianists and agnostics.

It was, then, a pleasure to inspect the work of the Doshisha, the foremost Christian school in Japan, famous as the institution founded by that great Japanese Christian, Joseph Hardy Neesima. For the Doshisha has graduated men who lead. The Doshisha is not perfect. There are not enough foreign teachers to bring its English up to the proper level. It is moving ahead on its own lines, paying little heed to lesser Christian schools. But it has as its president one of the most influential Christians among the Japanese, and it is holding fixedly to the one purpose for which it was founded and which gave it its name.

The morning before he died, Joseph Hardy Neesima dictated a letter in which he stated the object of the school which he had founded and in whose service he had given his life:

"The object of Doshisha is the advancement of Christianity, literature and science, and the furtherance of all education. The object of the education given by the Doshisha is not theology, literature and science by themselves; but that, through these, men of great and living power may be trained up for the service of true freedom and their country."

Scholarship alone does not justify a single Christian school for men or boys in Japan. The only justification for Christian schools for the male population of Japan is in the Christian character and scholarship of their graduates. The future of Christianity in Japan depends upon Christian scholarship.

There is nothing I would rather see, as an American and a Christian, than a dominant Christian university in Japan, endowed by American money, manned by American scholars. Christian progress in Japan must ever suffer for the lack of such an institution, but I doubt whether the Japanese government, in case a great Christian university were possible, would allow it freedom to dominate the educational situation. The next best thing, then, is as fine a Christian school as can be had under existing circumstances. Doshisha, Aoyama and Kwansei are seeking this ideal.

AT least three Doshisha graduates are already prominent figures in literary Japan. Iichiro Tokutomi is the editor of the Kokumin and a crown member of the House of Peers—probably the leading journalist of the Empire. His brother, Kenjiro Tokutomi, is the leading novelist of Japan today. The third of the trio is Kazutami Ukita, one of the Kumomoto band who studied under Captain Janes and entered the Doshisha the year after it was founded. He is a Yale graduate and a prominent figure in Japanese journalism and education, for he not only edits the Taiyo but is a professor in Waseda University.

In the Doshisha library there is a small case filled with the published works of Doshisha men, and the number is rapidly increasing. Several prominent preachers also have a place in the literary life of Japan. The Christian books of Colonel Yamamuro of the Salvation Army have a large circulation and a far-reaching effect for good. President Harada is also a writer of note, his "Faith of Japan" being the clearest treatise on the subject I have seen. The Doshisha, as a training school for Christian journalists, is worthy of notice. The Christian spirit of the school is proven not only by the fact that more than 350 of the students, in a student body of 1,500, are professing Christians, but by the Christian service which Doshisha students render to others, and the live interest they take in Christian work in the native churches. Forty-eight boys and twenty-six girls joined the Doshisha church last year.

On one of the mornings when I visited the Doshisha it was very cold and the Kyoto mists had not lifted their soggy blanket from the beautiful city. But several hours before I arrived, scores of girls had been up in the "Watch Tower," praying for the school they love. I visited the school on "Doshisha Day" and saw twelve hundred young men rise from the mats in the crowded hall and sing, "A mighty fortress is our God"; and I knew that they sang the truth, for in Doshisha, as in other Christian schools for men in Japan, the raw material from which leaders are made is what is left after the Imperial Universities and the government schools have skimmed the cream of the student body.

In one of the dormitories was a fine exhibition of religious pictures and in another an exhibition of pseudo-curios. A dinner bell was labeled "American Liberty Bell," which was kind, considering our slavery to our stomachs. A feudal bow, with extra strings on it, was a very good representation of David's harp. A bottled snake from the zoology department bore eloquent testimony to the power of Shakespeare to stir the imaginations of Orientals, for it was labeled "The Asp that Killed Cleopatra." A Billiken bore the name of the premier; some tin medals purported to be those won in contest by the director of athletics; a red-inked shirt gave ghastly testimony to the effect a Kobe maniac murderer had on Japanese thought at the time; and a tin pail masqueraded as the helmet of Don Quixote. Antony and Cleopatra came in for more notoriety through the presence in the collection of a small ring, evidently rescued from a penny prize package and with its red stone dulled by contact with sticky candy, but bearing the illuminating and romantic appellation, "Engagement Ring of Antony and Cleopatra."

In many of the halls at the Doshisha are long benches which were used at the time of the coronation in Kyoto and were given to the Christian school by the "divine" emperor of Japan.

I HAVE been asked how the Christians in Japan reconcile Christ and belief in him with the conception of a "divine" emperor. It was my privilege on the emperor's official birthday, which was held two months late, to attend a union meeting of the Japanese Christians, uniting in prayer to God that their emperor might be protected and blessed in his reign. It differed in no detail from what a similar service would be in America, when Christians asked the blessing of God upon the President of the United States and all those who are associated with him in office.

The popular belief in the divinity of the Emperor is to my mind one of the critical questions in Japanese thought and politics. The present emperor is a lesser man than his predecessor, and he rules a different class of subjects. There would seem to be no peaceful solution of the question aside from the one which the Christians have adopted of reverencing the ruler as ruler and omitting mention of him as Lord. But the whole idea of divinity in the emperor takes on new meaning when one considers an incident which occurred under Meiji. An attempt had been made on the life of the ruler, and the premier had tried to resign. Meiji refused such sacrifice, saying, "I must have been untrue to the divine in me, or such an attempt could never have been made on my life. The fault is with me."

Much space has been given to the idea of the divinity of the emperor, and there is no doubt that it is a vital matter in present-day thought in Japan; but when one considers the night of the coronation when the incumbent for the throne entered that great hall, to be alone with God for hours of meditation, one must believe that there was revealed some lesson to the suppliant—one which may revolutionize the Japanese conception of imperial power.

In this change of opinion, the extension of scientific knowledge may prove an anesthetic which will make the inevitable change of thought less dangerous to the state. An intellectual renaissance is already well developed which may lead to a spiritual regeneration if the proper guidance is given.

There seems to be some thought that Western learning has brought a pessimism to Japan and a materialistic belief which is resulting in suicide among the students. This is not entirely borne out by the facts. Whether materialism is causing suicides in Japan or not, it is the inevitable materialism of modern life, which can be rounded out, rather than the pessimism of a newly awakened intellectuality. Christianity is the only religion in Japan today that can stand the glare of scientific thought.

Dr. Wainright mentioned many hindrances to the spread of Christianity in Japan. A worldly temper of mind, coupled with passion for gain, seriously hinders missionary work in Japan, as it does church work in America. "The chief obstacle to the advance of the Gospel is the practical denial of any immaterial part in man, on the part of the vast majority of the people of the nation." A throwing off of allegiance and the restraints of the past have brought a tendency to run into extremes of conduct and opinion. There is a spiritual panic caused by violent change. "Infidelity in matters of belief is accompanied by license in matters of practice. If the peculiar aspects of the situation in Japan call for a modification of mission policy, the changes needed to be effected are, first, a more intense spirit of prayer and supplication; secondly, more widespread preaching and a deeper sense of obligation to preach on the part of missionaries who have unduly shifted this burden to the Japanese; thirdly, more vigorous protests against special forms of social evil; and, lastly, the founding of a great Christian university. The plan to found a great Christian university should not be allowed to falter, for the present confusion of ideas can scarcely be cleared up until Christian scholarship of the very highest order becomes a productive force more generally throughout the country in the formation of ideals and in the creation of a much needed literature."

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, orphan daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement to Helen Barnet. But Burke's father refused his consent to a marriage which he considered a bad match, and as a compromise it was agreed that the young man should go into his father's factory immediately to learn the business from the ground up; and then if at the end of a year he had not changed his mind, he might marry, though even then he must not bring his bride to the old home. In a month, however, a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once his father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first two months of the honeymoon were spent in finding a home and trying to live in a flat on $15 a week. This problem was soon solved to Helen's satisfaction by means of a cookbook, price $2.50, and an account at the grocery, which she opened without Burke's knowledge, and which released some of her weekly allowance for an occasional ice cream soda and movie show in company with Mrs. Jones, her neighbor across the hall

CHAPTER VI

The Husband

BURKE DENBY had never given any thought as to whether he were going to be a perfect husband or not. He had wanted to marry Helen, and he had married her. That was all there was to it, except, of course, that they had got to show his father that they could make good.

So far as being a husband—good, bad, or indifferent—was concerned, Burke was not giving any more thought to it now than he had given before his marriage. He was quite too busy giving thought to other matters—many other matters.

There was first his work. He hated it. He hated the noise, the smell, the grime, the overalls, the men he worked with, the smug superciliousness of his especial "boss." He felt abused and indignant that he had to endure it all. As if it were necessary to put him through such a course of sprouts as this! As if, when the time came, he could not run the business successfully without all these years of dirt and torture! Was an engineer, then, made to build an engine before he could be taught to handle the throttle? Was a child made to set the type of a primer before he could be taught his letters? Of course not! But they were making him not only set the type, but go down into the mines and dig the stuff the type was made of before they would teach him his letters. Yet they pretended it all must be done if he would ever learn to read—that is, to run the Denby Iron Works. Bah! He had a mind to chuck it all. He would if it weren't for dad. Dad hated quitters. And dad was looking wretched enough, as it was.

And that was another thing—dad.

Undeniably Burke was very unhappy over his father. He did not like to think of him, yet his face was always before him, pale and drawn, as he had seen it at that first interview after his return. As the days passed, Burke, in spite of his wish not to see his father, found himself continually seizing every opportunity that might enable him to see him. Daily he found himself haunting doorways and corridors, quite out of his way, when there was a chance that his father might pass.

He told himself that it was just that he wanted to convince himself that his father did not look quite so bad, after all. But he knew in his heart that it was because he hoped his father would speak to him in the old way, and that it might lead to the tearing down of this horrible high wall of indifference and formality that had risen between them. Burke hated that wall.

The wall was there, however, always. Nothing ever came of these connivings and loiterings except (if it were during working hours) a terse hint from the foreman, perhaps, to get back on his job. How Burke hated that foreman!

And that was another thing—his position among his fellow workmen. He was with them, but not of them. His being among them at all was plainly a huge joke—and when one is acting a tragedy in all seriousness, one does not like to hear chuckles as at a comedy. But, for that matter, Burke found the comedy element always present, wherever he went. The entire town took himself, his work, and his marriage as a huge joke—a subject for gay badinage, jocose slaps on the back, and gleeful cries of:—

"Well, Denby, how goes it? How doth the happy bridegroom?"

And Burke hated that, too.

It seemed to Burke, indeed, sometimes, that he hated everything but Helen. Helen, of course, was a dear—the sweetest little wife in the world. As if any one could help loving Helen! And however disagreeable the day, there was always Helen to go home to at night.

Oh, of course, he had to take that abominable flat along with Helen—naturally, as long as he could not afford to put her in a more expensive place. But that would soon be remedied—just as soon as he got a little ahead.

This "going home to Helen" had been one of Burke's happiest anticipations ever since his marriage. It would be so entrancing to find Helen and Helen's kiss waiting for him each night! Often had such thoughts been in his mind during his honeymoon trip; but never had they been so poignantly promising of joy as they were on that first day at the Works, after his disheartening interview with his father. All the rest of that miserable day it seemed to Burke that the only thing he was living for was the going home to Helen that night.

"Home," to Burke, had always meant a place of peace and rest, of luxurious ease and noiseless servants, of orderly rooms and well-served meals, of mellow lights and softly blended colors. Unconsciously now home still meant the same, with the addition of Helen—Helen, the center of it all. It was this dear vision, therefore, that he treasured all through his honeymoon trip, that he hugged to himself all that wretched first day of work, and that was still his star of hope as he hurried that night toward the Dale Street flat. If he had stopped to think, he would have realized at once that this new home of a day was not the old home of years. But he did not stop to think of anything except that for the first time in his life he was going home from work to Helen, his wife.

Burke Denby never forgot the shock of that first home-going. He opened the door of his apartment—and confronted chaos: a surly janitor struggling with a curtain pole, a confusion of trunks, chairs, a stepladder, and a floor-pail, a disorder of dishes on a coverless table, a smell of burned milk, and a cross, tired, untidy wife who flung herself into his arms with a storm of sobs.

"Home," after that, meant something quite new to Burke Denby. It meant Helen, of course, but—

Still it would be only for a little while, after all, he consoled himself each day. Just as soon as he got ahead a little, it would be different. He could sell the stuff, then; and the very first thing to go would be that hideous purple pillow on the red plush sofa—for that matter, the sofa would follow after, mighty quick. And the chairs, too. They were a little worse to sit on than to look at—which was unnecessary. As for the rugs—when it came to those, it would be his turn to select next time. At all events, he would not be obliged to have one that, the minute you opened the door, bounced into your face and screamed "Hullo! I'm here. See me!" How he hated that rug! And the pictures and those cheap gilt vases—everything, of course, would be different in the new home.

Nor did Burke stop to think that this constant shifting, in one's mind, of things that are to things that may some time be, scarcely makes for content.

Still, Burke could not have forgotten his house-furnishings, even if he had tried to do so, for he had to make payments on them "every few minutes," as he termed it. Indeed, one of the unsolved riddles of his life these days was as to why there were so many more Mondays (the day he paid his instalments) than there were Saturdays (the day the Works paid him) in a week. For that matter, after all was said and done, perhaps to nothing was Burke Denby giving more thought these days than to money.

Burke's experience with money heretofore had been to draw a check for what he wanted. True, he sometimes overdrew his account a trifle; but there was always his allowance coming the first of the month; and neither he nor the bank worried.

Now it was quite different. There was no allowance, and no bank—save his pocket, and there was only fifteen dollars a week coming into that. He would not have believed that fifteen dollars a week could go so quickly, and buy so little. Very early in the first month of housekeeping all that remained of his allowance was gone. What did not go at once to make payments on the furniture was paid over to Helen to satisfy some of her many requests for money.

And that was another of Burke's riddles—why Helen needed so much money just to get them something to eat. True, of late, she had not asked for it so frequently. She had not, indeed, asked for any for some time—for which he was devoutly thankful. He would not have liked to refuse her; and he certainly was giving her all that he could afford to give, without her asking.

Still he was glad to do it for Helen. Helen was a little brick. How pretty she looked when she was holding forth on his "making good," and her not "dragging" him "down"! Bless her heart! As if she could be guilty of such a thing as that! Why, she was going to drag him up—Helen was! And the fact was that she was doing pretty well, too, running the little home, for a girl who did not know a thing about it, to begin with. She was doing a whole lot better than at first. Breakfast had not been late for two weeks, nor dinner, either. And she was almost always at the door to kiss him now, too, while at the first he had to hunt her up, only to find her crying in the kitchen, probably—something wrong somewhere.

Oh, to be sure, he was getting a little tired of potato salad, and he always had abhorred those potato-chippy things; and he himself did not care much for cold meat. But, of course, after she got a little more used to things she wouldn't serve that sort of trash quite so often. He would be getting real things to eat, pretty soon—good, juicy beefsteaks and roasts, and nice fresh vegetables and fruit short-cakes, with muffins and griddle-cakes for breakfast. But Helen was a little brick—Helen was. And she was doing splendidly!

CHAPTER VII

STUMBLING-BLOCKS

MRS. BURKE DENBY was a little surprised at the number of letters directed to her husband in the morning mail that first day of November, until she noticed the familiar names in the upper left-hand corners of several of the envelopes.

"Oh, it's the bills," she murmured, drawing in her breath a little uncertainly. "To-day's the first, and they said they'd send them then. But I didn't think there'd be such a lot of them. Still, I've had things at all those places. Well, anyway, he'll be glad to pay them all at once, without my teasing for money all the time," she finished with resolute insistence, as she turned back to her work.

If, now that the time had come, and the bills lay before her in all their fearsome reality, Helen was beginning to doubt the wisdom of her financial system, she would not admit it, even to herself. And she still wore a determinedly cheerful face when her husband came home to dinner that night. She went into the kitchen as he began to open his mail—she was reminded of a sudden something that needed her attention. Two minutes later she nearly dropped the dish of potato salad she was carrying, at the sound of his voice from the doorway.

"Helen, what in heaven's name is the meaning of these bills?" He was in the kitchen now, holding out a sheaf of tightly clutched papers in each hand.

Helen set the potato salad down hastily.

"Why, Burke, don't—don't look at me so!"

"But what does this mean? What are these things?"

"Why, they—they're just bills, I suppose. They said they'd be."

"Bills! Helen! You don't mean to say that you do know about them—that you bought all this stuff?"

Helen's lips began to quiver.

"Burke, don't—please don't look like that. You frighten me."

"Frighten you! What do you think of me?—springing a thing like this!"

"Why, Burke, I—I thought you'd like it."

"Like it!"

"Y-yes—that I didn't have to ask you for money all the time. And you'd have to p-pay 'em sometime, anyhow. We had to eat, you know."

"But, Helen! We aren't a hotel! Look at that—'salad'—'salad'—'salad,'" he exploded, pointing a shaking finger at a series of items on the uppermost bill in his left hand. "There's tons of the stuff there, and I always did abominate it!"

"Why, Burke, I—I—" And the floods came.

"Oh, Helen, Helen, don't—please don't!"

"But I thought I was going to p-please you, and you called me a h-hotel, and said you a-abominated it!" she wailed, stumbling away blindly.

With a despairing ejaculation Burke flung the bills to the floor, and caught the sob-shaken little figure of his wife in his arms.

"There, there, I was a brute, and I didn't mean it—not a word of it. Sweetheart, don't, please don't," he begged. "Why, girlie, all the bills in Christendom aren't worth a tear from your dear eyes. Come, won't you stop?"

But Helen did not stop, at once. The storm was short, but tempestuous. At the end of ten minutes, however, together they went into the dining-room. Helen carried the potato salad (which Burke declared he was really hungry for to-day), and Burke carried the bills crumpled in one hand behind his back, his other arm around his wife's waist.

That evening a remorseful, wistful-eyed wife and a husband with an "I'll-be-patient-if-it-kills-me" air went over the subject of household finances, and came to an understanding.

There were to be no more charge accounts. For the weekly expenses Helen was to have every cent that could possibly be spared; but what she could not pay cash for, they must go without, if they starved. In a pretty little book she must put down on one side the money received. On the other, the money spent. She was a dear, good little wife, and he loved her 'most to death; but he couldn't let her run up bills when he had not a red cent to pay them with. He would borrow, of course, for these—he was not going to have any dirty little tradesmen pestering him with bills all the time! But this must be the last. Never again!

THE · NEW · ORDER

VERSE AND DECORATION BY HAROLD SPEAKMAN

A THOUSAND sodden years of crime and blood.
Ten thousand chains upon a prostrate folk,
Legions of bondmen plodding in the mud
Too dull with pain to strive against the yoke—

Then from the depths of silent misery
The truth rings out on lips of dying men
High to God's judgment seat—and then—and then—
The mighty soul of Russia rises—free!

And Helen said yes, yes, indeed. And she was very sure she would love to keep the pretty little book, and put down all the money she got, and all she spent.

All this was very well in theory. But in practice—

At the end of the first week Helen brought her book to her husband, and spread it open before him with great gusto.

On the one side were several entries of small sums, amounting to eight dollars received. On the other side were the words: "Spent all but seventeen cents."

"Oh, but you should put down what you spent it for," corrected Burke, with a merry laugh.

"Why?"

"Why, er—so you can see—er—what the money goes for."

"What's the difference—if it goes?"

"Oh, shucks! You can't keep a cash account that way! You have to put 'em both down, and then—er—balance up and see if your cash comes right. See, like this," he cried, taking a little book from his pocket. "I'm keeping one." And he pointed to a little list which read:

Lunch	$ .25
Car-fare	.10
Paper	.02
Helen	2.00
Paper	.02

"Now that's what I spent yesterday. You want to put yours down like that, then add 'em up and subtract it from what you receive. What's left should equal your cash on hand."

"Hm-m; well, all right," assented Helen dubiously, as she picked up her own little book.

Helen looked still more dubious when she presented her book for inspection the next week.

"I don't think I like it this way," she announced, with a pout.

"Why not?"

"Why, Burke, the mean old thing steals—actually steals! It says I ought to have one dollar and forty-five cents; and I haven't got but fourteen cents! It's got it itself—somewhere!"

"Ho, that's easy, dear!" The man gave an indulgent laugh. "You didn't put 'em all down—what you spent."

"But I did—everything I could remember. Besides, I borrowed fifty cents of Mrs. Jones. I didn't put that down anywhere. I didn't know where to put it."

"Helen! You borrowed money—of that woman?"

"She isn't 'that woman'! She's my friend, and I like her," flared Helen, hotly. "I had to have some eggs, and I didn't have a cent of money. I shall pay her back, of course,—next time you pay me."

Burke frowned.

"Oh, come, come, Helen, this will never do," he remonstrated. "Of course you'll pay her back; but I can't have my wife borrowing of the neighbors!"

"But I had to! I had to have some eggs," she choked, "and—"

"Yes, yes, I know. But I mean, we won't again," interrupted the man desperately, fleeing to cover in the face of the threatening storm of sobs. "And, anyhow, we'll see that you have some money now," he cried gayly, plunging his hands into his pockets, and pulling out all the bills and change he had. "There, 'with all my worldly goods I thee endow,'" he laughed, lifting his hands above her bright head, and showering the money all over her.

Like children then they scrambled for the rolling nickels and elusive dimes; and in the ensuing frolic the tiresome account-book was forgotten—which was exactly what Burke had hoped would happen.

This was the second week. At the end of the third, the "mean old thing" was in a worse muddle than ever, according to Helen; and, for her part, she would rather never buy anything at all if she had got to go and tell that nuisance of a book every time!

The fourth Saturday night Helen did not produce the book at all.

"Oh, I don't keep that any longer," she announced, with airy nonchalance, in answer to Burke's question. "It never came right, and I hated it, anyhow. So what's the use? I've got what I've got, and I've spent what I've spent. So what's the difference?" And Burke, after a feeble remonstrance, gave it up as a bad job. Incidentally it might be mentioned that Burke was having a little difficulty with his own cash account, and was tempted to accuse his own book of stealing—else where did the money go?

It was the next Monday night that Burke came home with a radiant countenance.

"Gleason's here—up at the Hancock House. He's coming down after dinner."

"Who's Gleason?"

Helen's tone was a little fretful—there was a new, intangible something in her husband's voice that Helen did not understand, and that she did not think she liked.

"Gleason! Who's Doc Gleason!" exclaimed Burke, with widening eyes. "Oh, I forgot. You don't know him, do you?" he added, with a slight frown. Burke Denby was always forgetting that Helen knew nothing of his friends or of himself until less than a year before. "Well, Doc Gleason is the best ever.

Austria Breaks Relations. On April 8 the American embassy at Vienna was notified that Austria-Hungary had decided to break off diplomatic relations with the United States because of the declaration of war by the United States against Germany. American Ambassador Penfield was already on his way home. The American chargé d'affaires at Vienna received the communication of the Austrian government and forwarded it to Washington at once. On April 10 the Austrian chargé in Washington received passports for himself and the members of the embassy staff. The State Department immediately took steps to arrange for the safe-conduct of the Austrian diplomats to a port from which they can reach home. Upon the breaking of relations American customs officers immediately seized the Austrian merchant vessels self-interned in this country.

Congress Rushes War Measures. During the week all the efforts of the Administration in every department have been focused upon preparations for war. The House Ways and Means Committee on April 10 agreed to submit to the House a bill providing for the greatest bond issue in the history of nations, the total amount contemplated being $7,000,000,000, of which $5,000,000,000 is to be in bonds and $2,000,000,000 in certificates of indebtedness, to be redeemed out of the proceeds of new taxes. These bonds are to draw three and one-half per cent. interest, and bonds previously authorized but not sold are to be convertible into the new bonds. By the terms of the bill the President and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized to acquire the obligations of foreign governments in an amount not to exceed $3,000,000,000. The bill passed the House April 14 by 389 to 0, and was immediately taken up in the Senate. The Administration's army bill providing for the enlisting of the regular army and the National Guard to full strength, and the application of the selective draft to the raising of the two complements of 500,000 each, appeared at this writing to be having hard sledding. The President went to the Capitol on April 11, where he held conferences with the leaders of both parties in the House in an effort to insure the prompt passage of the army bill. These leaders were reported to have told the President that there was strong opposition in the House to any form of conscription under whatever name. It was suggested later that the House might amend the bill to provide for a test of the volunteer system before any form of draft should be used. The willingness of American citizens to volunteer will be given somewhat of a test in the process of raising our present military forces to their war strength, which will require a total of 517,868 men, according to an estimate made on April 12. During the first ten days following the signing of the war resolution the regular army accepted 4,355 recruits. Recruiting was, however, impeded by the fact that under the regulations men were forced to enlist for from three to six years, whereas most of the men appearing at the recruiting stations were only willing to enlist for the length of the war. This difficulty was removed by an order from the War Department on April 12 stating that men enlisting now would be mustered out at the end of the war. While the recruiting officers were not as busy as they wished to be, marriage license bureaus all over the country were almost mobbed. On April 12 President Wilson approved the draft of a bill prepared by Representative Adamson under which the President in time of war or threatened war will have authority to take possession in whole or in part of the property of railroad, telephone and telegraph lines, property so taken over to be returned to its owners at the expiration of the war or sooner, at the discretion of the President. The bill was drawn to include an increase of the Interstate Commerce Commission from seven to eleven members. The bill was at once introduced in the House. Plans are also being rushed for the construction of the great fleet of wooden ships of 2,000 tons and upward. It was reported that the President would ask Major General Goethals to direct the construction of these vessels. The war plan of the national government was announced in special news dispatches on April 10 to stand as follows: to utilize the navy in every possible way in joint operations with the British and French navies against the German sea forces; to munition the Entente Allies to the fullest possible extent; to make an immediate loan of $3,000,000,000 to the Allies; to do everything possible for providing England with foodstuffs; to train a million men the first year, another million men the next year, none of whom are to be sent to the battlefront in Europe until the first million are ready and plans are completed for keeping this force supplied in the field. On April 12, 10,000 additional National Guardsmen were called into the Federal service.

Hoover Heads Food Board. It was announced on April 11 that Herbert C. Hoover, head of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium, had accepted the chairmanship of the new Food Board in the United States. Before returning to America from England, Mr. Hoover expected to receive reports on a complete survey of the food situation in France, England and Italy, and on the methods of food regulation and the prospects of the coming harvests. Mr. Hoover said: "If America will only eliminate waste and extravagance in food, it will go far to help the whole problem. The women of America really control America's food consumption. Among our Allies the women are working as hard as the men. There is no body of women in the world so capable of rising to an emergency as American women. Much can be done by the substitution of the more abundant commodities for those that our allies need most. Every person in America who eats corn bread instead of wheat bread helps in the present wheat shortage.

Republican Leaders Back the President. Colonel Theodore Roosevelt had a conference with President Wilson on April 10 in which he explained to the President his plan for raising a division of volunteers for service abroad. Neither Mr. Wilson nor Mr. Roosevelt would say at the conclusion of the conference what the decision was. Mr. Roosevelt later outlined his plan to representatives of the press and made a plea for support for the army bill under consideration in Congress. He stated: "I am already under orders." On April 12 ex-Justice Hughes declared that all Americans should pledge themselves behind Wilson's leadership, "so nobly declared." Former Secretary of State and Senator Elihu Root had also previously declared for the complete elimination of partisanship and the unfaltering support of the Administration.

To Reorganize Chinese Schools. Dr. Ping Wen Kuo, head of the Chinese Educational Commission, has arranged for a dozen American teachers to leave the Philippines for China immediately and for thrice as many more to leave before the end of 1917. These American teachers will establish normal and vocational schools and will have an important part in an entire reorganization of educational work in China, which is planned by the present government.

Brazil Breaks with Germany. A cabinet council at Rio Janeiro on April 10 decided that Brazil should sever her relations with Germany. Brazil has a population of 20,000,000, a peace army of 25,000 men, an organized reserve of 500,000 and 1,500,000 citizens trained in the rudiments of military tactics, with an available man power of 4,300,000.

American Liner Hits Mine. The American armed liner New York struck a mine on April 9 off the port of Liverpool. The passengers took to the boats and were soon rescued by patrol craft. The New York, however, stayed afloat and reached her dock under her own steam. The damage was confined to one hole of about 16 x 20 feet.

Munitions Plant Explosion. An explosion in the plant of the Eddystone Munitions Corporation at Chester, Pa., near Philadelphia, on April 10, resulted in the death of about 150 persons and the serious injury of as many more. The cause of the explosion had not been ascertained at this writing, but it was thought not to have been accidental.

War Council in Washington. Secretary Lansing on April 11 confirmed an unofficial report from London that British and French commissions were coming to this country in the interests of a better understanding of the intentions of the United States and Great Britain in conducting the war. Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, British Foreign Minister, was reported to be at the head of the British delegation, and M. Viviani, Minister of Justice in the French cabinet, was reported at the head of the French delegation.

Newsprint-Makers Indicted. The Federal Grand Jury at New York on April 12 returned indictments against seven men accused of entering into a combination to limit the output and increase the price of newsprint paper. Five of the men are executive officers of the Newsprint Association, one was a banker and the other an officer of a paper company. It had been generally understood that the agreement entered into between the newsprint makers and the Federal Trade Board, by which the papermakers agreed upon a price-fixing plan, was to be the end of governmental action. It was even intimated that the indictments might disturb the Federal Trade Board's plans.

To Produce Food. The Agricultural Department, under the leadership of Secretary Houston, is undertaking to stimulate the planting of every available acre in the Union to food crops. The secretary on April 6 left Washington for a trip through the West, in which he expected to confer with the commissioners of agriculture in the various states. It is widely recognized that, however the nations may be aligned, hunger is the enemy of all. The greatest problem in America appears to be the problem of labor for the farms. It has been suggested that if drafting is resorted to a sufficient number of able-bodied men could be drafted for the work of producing food.

Relief Ship Sunk. On April 7 the Norwegian steamship Camilla, in the service of the Belgian Relief Commission, was torpedoed, being the fourth relief ship to be torpedoed in four days and the seventh since February 1. Three others were fired on and escaped. The four ships last torpedoed carried 17,000 tons of foodstuffs.

To Run Railroads. The American Railway Association, meeting at the call of the Council of National Defense in Washington on April 11, selected a board of five railway executives to direct the operations of the railroads of the country throughout the war. The men chosen were Fairfax Harrison of the Southern Railway, Howard Elliott of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, Samuel Rea of the Pennsylvania, Hale Holden of the Burlington, and Julius Kruttschnitt of the Southern Pacific. Daniel Willard of the Baltimore and Ohio, a member of the Defense Council, will be an ex-officio member of the committee.

Fragments of News. The American Bible Society, when war was declared, issued an emergency call for $50,000 with which to provide soldiers and Secretary Daniels announced on April 11 that Charleston, W. Va., had been selected as the site of the government armor-plate plant authorized by the last Congress.

The President Calls to Service

THE President issued on April 15 a proclamation to the people addressed "My fellow countrymen," prefacing his proclamation with the fact of our entrance as a nation into the "grave and terrible war for democracy and human rights which has shaken the world" and with the statement that "the navy is being put upon an effective war footing," that steps are being taken to equip a great army, and that "we are fighting for what we believe and wish to be the rights of mankind and for the future peace and security of the world." The President listed as follows the things that we must do and do well, besides fighting:

"We must supply abundant food for ourselves and for our armies and our seamen, not only, but also for a large part of the nations with whom we have now made common cause, in whose support and by whose sides we shall be fighting.

"We must supply ships by the hundreds to carry to the other side of the sea, submarines or no submarines, abundant materials out of our fields, mines and factories with which not only to clothe and equip our own forces, but also to clothe and support our people, and to help clothe and equip the armies with which we are cooperating in Europe; coal. . . ; steel. . . ; rails. . . ; locomotives and rolling stock. . . ; mules, horses, cattle. . . ; everything which the people of England and France and Italy and Russia have usually supplied themselves but cannot now afford the men or materials or the machinery to make. . . ."

"It is evident to every thinking man that our industries, on the farms, in the shipyards, in the mines, in the factories, must be made more prolific and more efficient than ever, and that they must be more economically managed and better adapted to the particular requirements of our task than they have been; and what I want to say is that the men and the women who devote their thought and their energy to these things will be serving the country and conducting the fight for peace and freedom just as truly and just as effectively as the men on the battlefield or in the trenches. . . .

"I take the liberty, therefore, of addressing this word to the farmers of the country and to all who work on the farms: The supreme need of our own nation and of the nations with which we are cooperating is an abundance of supplies, and especially of foodstuffs. The importance of an adequate food supply, especially for the present year, is superlative. Without abundant food, alike for the armies and the peoples now at war, the whole great enterprise upon which we have embarked will break down and fail. The world's food reserves are low. . . .

"Upon the farmers of this country, therefore, in large measure rests the fate of the war and the fate of the nations. May the nation not count upon them to omit no step that will increase the production of their land or that will bring about the most effectual cooperation in the sale and distribution of their products? The time is short. It is of the most imperative importance that everything possible be done, and done immediately, to make sure of large harvests. I call upon young men and old alike and upon the ablebodied boys of the land to accept and act upon this duty—to turn in hosts to the farms and make certain that no pains and no labor is lacking in this great matter.

"I particularly appeal to the farmers of the South to plant abundant foodstuffs, as well as cotton. They can show their patriotism in no better or more convincing way than by resisting the great temptation of the present price of cotton and helping, helping upon a great scale, to feed the nation. . . .

"The Government of the United States and the governments of the several states stand ready to co-operate. . . . The course of trade shall be as unhampered as it is possible to make it, and there shall be no unwarranted manipulation of the nation's food supply by those who handle it on its way to the consumer. This is our opportunity to demonstrate the efficiency of a great democracy, and we shall not fall short of it!

"This let me say to the middlemen of every sort: . . . The eyes of the country will be especially upon you. This is your opportunity for signal service, efficient and disinterested. . . . I shall confidently expect you to deserve and win the confidence of people of every sort and station.

"To the men who run the railways of the country, let me say that the railways are the arteries of the nation's life. . . . To the merchant let me suggest the motto, 'Small profits and quick service,' and to the shipbuilder the thought that the life of the war depends upon him. . . . To the miner let me say that he stands where the farmer does: the work of the world waits on him. If he slackens or fails, armies and statesmen are helpless. . . . The manufacturer does not need to be told, I hope, that the nation looks to him to speed and perfect every process. . .'

"Let me suggest, also, that every one who creates or cultivates a garden helps, and helps greatly, to solve the problem of the feeding of the nations; and that every housewife who practices strict economy puts herself in the ranks of those who serve the nation. . . .

"The supreme test of the nation has come. We must all speak, act, and serve together."

The Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE actual fighting of the past week was almost exclusively on the western front. On the Austro-Italian front, aside from the routine artillery duels, there was little or no activity.

The eastern and Rumanian fronts were quiet, and seem likely to remain so for some time, both owing to the depth of the peculiarly tenacious mud which the spring thaws on these fronts have created and which makes military activities on any extended scale impossible, and because, as a result of the negotiations apparently going on between one section of the Russian revolutionists and representatives of the Central Empires, military activities by the Central Allies would be inappropriate.

The Jerusalem front has also been rather quiet since the fight south of Gaza.

What is going on upon the sea we do not know reliably. The British weekly official report of the losses to mercantile shipping in the blockaded areas around the British Isles states that during the week ending April 8 seventeen steamers of over 1,600 tons, two of less than 1,600 tons, and six sailing vessels were sunk as the result of the Teutonic submarine activities. But this, of course, throws no light on the number of British vessels sunk elsewhere, in the Mediterranean, etc., nor on the number of neutral vessels sunk in the barred zone.

The Italian report for the same week states that five Italian steamers under 3,000 tons, and ten sailing vessels, have been sunk. This report is only of the barred area around Italy. It is impossible, therefore, in view of the fragmentary character of the information at hand, to form any idea of the general results of the submarine activities.

The Germans had a destroyer sunk by a British submarine, and another damaged off the Belgian coast, while a British patrol vessel was sunk by a mine in the Channel during the week.

There has been an unusually large crop of peace rumors during the week, coming from all points of the compass and involving practically all the belligerents. But it is impossible to say whether any of these have any real foundation.

If the other fronts were quiet, such was not the case on the sectors of the western front lying immediately north and south of the city of Arras.

A road, whereon Neuville-St. Vaast is the half-way house, connects Arras and Givenchy. Rising to the eastward of the Arras-Givenchy road are two of the important strategic points of the front north of Arras, Hills No. 140 and No. 119, which form the so-called heights of Vimy.

These heights rise rather abruptly from the road, and, after attaining their maximum, drop sharply to the Arras-Lens road, on the eastern side of which rises the north and south running ridge on which Vimy itself is located. This ridge ends with the outer houses of Vimy, and a fall of about 400 feet takes place in the mile and a half between Vimy, Thelus and Farbus, villages southwest and southeast of it.

South of Neuville-St. Vaast and Farbus to Arras, the country is flat. The heights of Vimy have been the scene of very hard fighting several times during the war. In September, 1915, the French captured the heights at the cost, it is said, of 100,000 casualties, and after holding them for two months were driven back to the west of the Arras-Givenchy road.

On Monday, April 10, after a prolonged bombardment, the British launched a powerful offensive against the German positions on Vimy heights, and from their southerly end, as far south as Arras and beyond. The British base line began in the southwestern outskirts of Givenchy road and extended to Arras itself, six and a half miles away. Desperate fighting ensued and the battle lasted almost without intermission for three whole days. When the smoke cleared away it was found that the British had won one of the most signal victories they have gained so far during the war. Petit Vimy and Vimy remained in the hands of the Teutons until April 13, when they were captured by the British, who pushed forward in the next two days to the outskirts of Lens.

In this battle the British captured about 15,000 prisoners, 160 or 170 guns of all calibers, from 8-inch howitzers down, a couple of hundred machine guns and a large amount of other booty. In various counter-attacks the Germans captured some 2,000 British and a little light artillery.

On the whole, the battle can be described as the worst reverse the Germans have experienced on the western front in over a year. The casualties on both sides appear to have been severe.

Praying and Doing

RECENTLY a reader of the Christian Herald wrote us asking whether there is in prayer alone a sufficiency for all the demands of the Christian life. He asked much more, but the gist of his letter was whether prayer is or is not all that is needed to be a Christian and to give assurance of salvation.

We believe that prayer is the strongest weapon in the armory of the believer. Through communion with God he obtains spiritual reinforcement in every trial, strength to overcome every obstacle, courage to face every danger, and inspiration to carry him safely through many a difficult experience. But prayer is not all, by any means, although there are many Christians who seem so to regard it. Jesus, our great Exemplar, showed its value by the frequency with which he used it and taught his followers to do likewise. With him it was a means to an end. He prayed in order to be strengthened for the tests he knew to be imminent. "My work," he said, "is to do the will of my Father." Prayer was an adjunct and not the work itself.

There is no stronger or better Christian than the praying Christian. His efficiency largely rests in the fact that the strength he receives in prayer he expends in many forms of spiritual work. Without service our spiritual life can not be rounded out. The Lord doesn't want us to stop at praying, but to be up and doing. We are not merely to ask to be accepted as stewards in his vineyard, but we must do the work that is to be done there. "By their fruits [works done for his sake] ye shall know them." And if we work in the spirit of earnest willingness, giving our best service, however small it may be in comparison with all that has to be done, we shall then and only then have performed our duty.

As it is with an individual, so with a church. There are some congregations that pray much and yet do little or nothing. They rarely translate their faith into action, or put the strength derived through prayer to practical use. What would we say of a church which prayed for the coming of the Kingdom, yet sent out no missionaries to spread the Gospel; or pleaded for the suffering ones, but held out no helping hand; or cried to God for the purification of the community, yet took no step to clean up the slums, or to help in the reclamation and uplift of the fallen, the redemption of the drunkard, or the rectification of the wrongs that lie easily within reach?

There are some individuals whose lives are so self-centered that spiritual growth becomes an impossibility. They are like a tree that hugs its limbs closely around itself, rather than that they should spread out and give shade and shelter to those in search of it. Such a tree would be self-blighted.

The ideal Christian life is one that both prays much and works much; that spends itself for others, freely, gladly, and with joy in every sacrifice. And for all our spending, we acquire multiplied strength and vigor to make us equal to still greater effort. He is a very poor type of Christian who is not spurred on by love for the Redeemer to strive to win others. "He that winneth souls is wise." While prayer gives us the capacity, the spoken word, the kindly hand and the gracious act are the normal corollaries of our petitions, the fruits of our faith. Our duty to man follows as the immediate sequel of our duty to God. And though none is saved by the merits of his own efforts, which ought to be the spontaneous outcome of love and gratitude, we should not forget that the fruitless tree is not fulfilling its mission.

World-Wide Golden Rule

WE are apt thoughtlessly to regard the Golden Rule as visionary—sounding well, but incapable of being practically applied.

But when we come carefully to analyze the progress of government, of business and of individual morality, all over the world, we find clearly that the Golden Rule is quietly, constantly, mightily at work.

Is it humanly impossible to do to others as we do to ourselves? The whole difference in doing comes of the difference in seeing. We excuse, because we refuse to see, in ourselves the faults that we do see and condemn in others. Could we see how greed debases and selfishness shuts us within our own narrow selves, we would detest these qualities in ourselves, just as we see and detest them in others. As far as true perception goes and true judgment results, the Golden Rule is automatically working.

That the Golden Rule does practically apply and is mightily working even far beyond the limits of individual conduct is clearly seen in the formation and success of this great Republic and the high development of its citizenship toward its ideals. Far easier to set up the principle that majorities shall govern than to maintain the equally sacred one that the rights of minorities shall be protected. In both America has demonstrated to the world not only that the Golden Rule will work, but that it works to mutual good and progress.

America has set up for its citizens the highest standards, and has made the greatest demands of civic duty upon its people that any country has ever made. We have become rich and powerful; but this is not all—we have become human. As a people and a government we have many faults and weaknesses, to be sure; but such strength as we have, such progress and peace as we have and such world domination as we are to have, are due not to greed or force, but to deep recognition of the equal rights of all men.

It is with hands unstained by conquest or oppression or injustice that America offers to war-shattered Europe our tested and triumphant principles for its salvation. And the world is looking to us; and from the blood-soaked trenches, from the ruined homes and from the despairing capitals is swelling the cry to us: "Come; teach us your principles and practices of peace, justice and equality!"

Just as in the love of neighbor as of self the Golden Rule is individualized, just as in the recognition of all citizens as having equal rights it is nationalized, so in the placing of all nations upon the same footing in the court of the world will it be internationalized.

It is coming, and coming soon.

Food Situation Critical

THE increasing scarcity of food supply is already creating a critical situation in our own country. We have long suffered high prices, but we now are coming face to face with an absolute lack of foodstuffs at any price.

The conditions that have brought Europe to the verge of starvation are now fast coming upon America. We have contributed with a liberal hand until our own supply is exhausted.

More and more millions of men are to be withdrawn from production. The world's granaries are empty. The wheat and corn, the meat and the canned goods are all gone. Reports from the winter grain regions forecast short crops, and the acreage in seed will not supply our own actual needs for the coming winter.

In this crisis there is no other appeal than that which President Wilson makes to the farmers: "In this greatest of human needs I feel that the American farmer will do his part to the uttermost. By planting and increasing his production in every way possible every farmer will perform a labor of patriotism for which he will be recognized as a soldier of the commissary, adding his share to the food supply of the people."

Immediate creation of a Federal Food Commission with power to fix prices and to supervise marketing and distribution of food in the United States during the war has been formally proposed by the National Agricultural Society. To meet high cost of labor and farm machinery the farmers must be enabled more readily to borrow money. Small food gardens must be everywhere encouraged. The Indians of the West are already being drafted into farm service under government supervision. By every possible method, every available foot of soil and every element of labor must be brought into maximum productiveness.

While all these necessary measures are being taken to save the country from the fast-increasing food shortage, it must not be forgotten that the first care and duty of our government are toward our own people. However strong may be the wish further to feed others in their extreme distress, it must firmly be kept in mind that the people of our own country have the first call upon our precarious food supply.

Comfort in Affliction

THERE are many ways by which the comfort of the Christ comes into the hearts of those who are in affliction and suffering. A word, a thought, a look, a strain of music, may awaken in the despondent mind the memory of the blessed promises and a new dependence on the divine mercy. In a letter which came to our hands a few days ago, this idea of help coming by suggestion is well expressed. The writer says: "Your splendid paper came into the home of one of its subscribers, the issue of March 21, and the front-page picture of the Christ looking down upon the widow and children, saying, 'Let not your heart be troubled,' caught the eye of a lady who was being carried from her home to undergo an operation in Cooper Hospital. The picture fastened itself on her mind, the words were familiar to her, and after being prepared for the operation, while being taken to the room and during the administering of the ether, she was heard constantly to repeat, 'Let not your heart be troubled.' After the operation, when regaining consciousness, her first words were 'Let not your heart be troubled.' The picture and its message were a great solace in the hour of affliction. It was my privilege yesterday to assist in returning her to her home, and one of the first things she asked for was that she might see again the Christian Herald that contained the picture and the words of the Master, 'Let not your heart be troubled,' which had been so comforting to her during the days in the hospital. The lady referred to is Mrs. G., of Camden, N. J., and I felt after learning the circumstances that you should know the real worth of your good messenger to this heart and home, as I am sure it is everywhere it goes.

"Mr. G. (the husband) is a railroad man, a member of this Association, and I have taken considerable interest in their case, as we endeavor to do with all those connected with our work.

W. H. Cox,

Habits Are Forces

EVEN without considering at all the common "bad habits," just think of the thousand and one little habits that largely determine one's every thought and act. In the commonest things every one is influenced by innumerable little habits that he seldom suspects. Hardly an impression, emotion, opinion, resolution or action is possible to us that is not influenced, directed and colored by fixed conditions within ourselves—habits.

Almost every move in the process of the morning's dressing, for example, is involuntary and calls for no conscious thought. Your mind is absorbed in mapping out the day's work while habit is washing and dressing you.

Habit accustoms us to doing most of the everyday things in particular ways, and we consciously turn the mind to them only when they chance to be done differently. The dividing line between efficiency and inefficiency is largely right here. Any one who stops to think about it can easily see that innumerable little habits make up a very large part of our lives. It is indeed well worth while carefully to study the host of little habits that breed and hide in the most secret cells of brain and muscle. None of them is too small to be worth attention.

Bad habits are the little threads with which the weak Lilliputians bound the strong Gulliver in helplessness.

Good habits are like a well-made harness, enabling us to do our work in the world with less friction and waste of energy.

Habits we cannot avoid. Nor can we escape being greatly controlled by them. But we have free choice between the habits that are good and helpful and habits that are bad and harmful.

The True and the False

THE president of a bank, when asked by a young clerk how he could distinguish the counterfeit bills from the good, said: "Get familiar with the good bills, and you will recognize the bad bills at sight."

Here is a vast volume of general wisdom summed up in a single sentence. This homely advice applies not only to the detection of counterfeit money, but with equal force to the detection of counterfeit in all departments of life.

The man accustomed to handling only good corn, good potatoes, good diamonds has no difficulty in detecting the faulty. He does it intuitively. Even without recognized thought he fixes upon the fault. The skillful egg-candler passes good eggs before the light with a rhythmic rapidity that is amazing, but an imperfect egg instantly breaks his routine and interrupts his process. To the trained musician, accustomed to high grade work, a false note comes like a stab of pain.

In any occupation or line of endeavor, any man fully engaged in doing the right thing will have no difficulty in recognizing the wrong. Right and wrong are as far apart, as unlike, as day and night; and he that is most accustomed to the light is quickest to note the shadows.

There is only one way to know the bad, the imperfect, the false, and that is by knowing the good, the perfect, the true.

Russia's Two Sober Years

THAT prohibition does actually prohibit in Russia is verified by the highest authority. Less than three years ago there were "entire drunken villages, drunken cities, a drunken army, a drunken Russia." July 29, 1914, the nation became suddenly sober and has continued so since. A Russian writer describes the blessed results of the abolition of drink. He says: "We are, therefore, more than overjoyed to know that it has been statistically proved that the daily producing capacity of the workingman, since the promulgation of that message of salvation, has been increased by 15 per cent., and that Monday, the day when millions of muzhik (farmers) were found in the gutters, has become a normal work-day in Russia. But not only the mir (village community) felt the consequences; the life also in the city was as if of a sudden transformed. The population rushed to the schools and savings-banks, cooperative societies opened their counters by the hundred. The whole aspect of the family life, the very looks of the people on the street, were changed. How quickly the population grasped the prospective benefits of the great reform is best shown by the fact that when it became known that the imperial ukase, in order to become legally valid, will need the express consent of the majority of the mirs, only an exceedingly low percentage refused the indorsement. In answer to circulars the peasants said: 'The men feel stronger. Their treatment of their women folk and attitude toward their neighbors is not the same as before.' 'The children are now nicely dressed and have even shoes on their feet. One hears no more quarreling in the izbas (farmhouses).' 'The people have become more honest.' Nobody has so quickly and completely grasped the import of the social revolution as woman, the greatest sufferer from the old alcohol curse. We are, therefore, not astonished to learn that as soon as the saloons were definitely closed the peasant women marched to the churches in Indian file to burn a candle each, thanking the Lord for the great delivery. When the question of repermitting the sale of beer and red wine came up in the Duma, Tarasov, a farmer-deputy, exclaimed: 'If the women would hear you, they would pull you down from this platform.'" There is scarcely a magazine of any importance that is not featuring by maps and most ably prepared articles the passing of the saloon. Some attribute its going to its inherent badness, others to big business, others to the facts of science that are against it. There are two giants that are killing alcohol: democracy, the people getting at the people's most inveterate enemy; and Christianity, which is smiting God's greatest earthly enemy. The revolution of our time against alcohol is in obedience to this command: "Abhor that which is evil." (Rom. 12 : 9.)

Bible, Immigrants' Test

THE United States Department of Labor announced the other day that reading matter for a literacy test for aliens under the new immigration law will be taken from the Bible. "This is not because the Bible is considered a sacred book by many people," said the Department's announcement, "but because it is now the only book in virtually every tongue. Translations of the Bible were made by eminent scholars, and, what is more to the point, the translating was done by men whose purpose it was to put the Bible in such simple and idiomatic expressions in the various foreign languages as would make it possible for the common people of foreign countries to grasp the meaning readily and thoroughly." As a literary repository, the Bible is the first book of the world. Its truth has guided the thoughts and inspired the lives of the greatest authors, poets, painters and musicians of past and present times. Huxley said it deserved the first place in the curriculum of the public schools of the nation on account of its literary and moral value. The Bible is the best literature of the world. It is more, infinitely more. It is the only book that can tell whence we came, whither we go, and what is required for the journey; the only book that can tell us how we can get away from sin, how we can find a Saviour, and how we may be happy forever. There is this reference to the deeper meaning of the Book than that of literary supremacy: "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." (John 5 : 39.)

Millman's Funeral Airplane Escort

A FUNERAL cortege of twelve airplanes escorted the body of "Tex" Millman, one of the youngest and most daring of aviators, from the church in Hempstead, Long Island, where the funeral service was held, to the grave at Westbury, where the burial services were conducted. When the funeral coaches had gotten out of Hempstead about a mile, there came out of the west one after another twelve biplanes. Executing a wide sweeping movement eastward, the squadron drifted through the low-hanging clouds, and finally hovered over the funeral party at an altitude of about 800 feet, in which position it remained until the procession arrived at the cemetery. Then the machines performed a wide circular detour of the chapel spire, and often crossed and recrossed one another's paths at close range. After the coffin had been lowered and the earth was being shoveled into the grave, three of the pilots, separating from the rest, volplaned nearer to earth, swept toward the grave, and then sped high into the east, leaving in their wake a beautiful wreath of red and white carnations, tied with red, white and blue streamers, which gradually fluttered to the ground. Two other pilots came down closer to the grave and dropped wreaths near the young widow, who had been a bride five months before. When the grave was filled the biplanes assembled again in the air, and it was then that the machines, starting on their return flight, suddenly formed the figure of a cross majestically suspended over the grave of the man who had so often been willing to risk his life in their cause. Young Millman was a Christian and the lovely flowers were the symbol of the land of perpetual springtime and eternal bloom into which he had flown, and the figure of the cross they executed in the sky was the symbol of the immortality secured and revealed by Christ's advent into the world and by his death on the cross. This blessed truth is thus stated: "But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." (II Tim. 1 : 10.)

Iowa's Sabbath Law

ENFORCEMENT of the Sunday laws in Iowa was made certain the other day, when the Assembly, by a vote of 79 to 25, refused to repeal the statutes making Sunday amusements illegal. Attorney General Havner, immediately following his induction into office, served notice that unless the laws on the subject should be repealed, he would strictly enforce them. Theaters, baseball, amusement parks and every other form of amusement will be under the ban, as also all kinds of labor except that which is necessary. The moral courage of the state of Iowa in sustaining its Sabbath laws is to be commended. The giving up of God's day, provided for rest and worship, to pleasure, amusement, professional sport and revelry is all wrong. It is a source of individual and public demoralization. Let the prosecuting attorney compel a strict enforcement of the Sunday laws in the interest of worship, of highest happiness and the most healthy public morals. Our modern Sunday laws are based on this Mosaic command: "These are the words which the Lord hath commanded, that ye should do them. Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you a holy day, a Sabbath of rest to the Lord. . . . Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the Sabbath day." (Ex. 35 : 1-3.)

Passing of Wild Life

IN an address at Cornell University Mr. Louis Agassiz Fuertes made a vigorous protest against the wanton destruction of wild birds and animals. He claimed that at least twenty-five species of them had been destroyed in the past seventy-five years. Prominent among the extinct species he mentioned the carrier pigeon, the last one of which died recently in the Zoological Museum. He mentioned among others the Labrador duck, the Carolina parakeet, and the Eskimo curlew. Some of them approaching extinction he said are the wood duck, the woodcock, and various shore birds, including the kill-deer plover. He lamented the passing of the buffalo and prong-horned antelope. Civilization means the passing of the wild. And yet Americans with such a heritage of wild life ought to have sense enough, and feeling enough as well, to be more merciful to the creatures of the wild. A certain amount of wild flesh is an important and delicious article of food, but the wanton massacre of this life is as cruel as it is economically disastrous. There ought to be room for the wild creatures and man, too, in so beautiful a land. The Jewish law sought to restrain the unnecessary killing of animals, even for sacrifice, by the injunction: "And whether it be cow or ewe, ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day." (Lev. 22 : 28.)

Kept Light in Window

MRS. MARY ERNST of Kenosha, Wisconsin, kept a light burning in the window of the upstairs room of her son Matt, who left home twenty years ago, believing that he would some day return to her. He did return to her the other day, but it was in his coffin. After wandering all over the earth he was found dead in the streets of Sacramento, Calif., with a letter addressed to his mother which he had not mailed and which led to his identification and return to his old home for burial. Was there ever human love so like Christ's as that of a mother for a wayward boy? Whoever else throws him down, she takes him up; whoever else abandons him, she presses him to her heart; whoever gives him over as a hopeless wreck, she says he will come back home again and be a good boy; and she lights the candle of love in the window, where he may see it, to welcome him when he comes. And yet God's love for us is stronger than that of a father or mother. "Hide not thy face far from me; put not thy servant away in anger. . . . When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." (Ps. 27 : 9-10.)

FROM ONE WOMAN TO ANOTHER

Conducted by MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

To the American Woman

YESTERDAY, wrapped as I was in the glow of the first spring sunshine, I wrote a gay little verse to head this page. It was a little verse that had to do with bird-songs, and opening buds, and scarlet flowers, and the lure of an awakening world. It was a glad little verse, written laughingly. And then, almost satisfied, I went to sleep. And I dreamed of pleasant fields and mossy woods, and violets hidden away in warmly damp meadows. And then the morning came, and I awoke to find myself living in the tumult of a war-swept country. And so I put away my gay little verse, sadly.

For the past three years we women have been reading—at first all athrill with excitement, later in a more placid way—about the European War. We have read of battle and strife, of sunken ships and shattered regiments. We have read of wounded men, maimed men, dying men. And we have given pity—but in the abstract.

Lately the rumble of guns and the smoke of powder has been coming nearer to us. We have heard vague rumors and vaguer facts about being involved in the great world conflict. But I, for one, was stunned when I saw the actual announcement in the cold black type of a newspaper. For the war had ceased to be something that one could look at in the abstract; the war had become a personal thing.

I am looking at a clipping as I write. "All men between the ages of nineteen and twenty-five will be called first," I read. And I am wondering if there is any woman, here in our United States, who does not see a message to herself in that notice. I am thinking of the sons, the brothers, the sweethearts and the husbands who come under that coldly printed heading.

IF women had a final voice in the matter there would be no war. Of that I am sure. For no one who is not a woman can feel the terrible fear that comes when a man—a man who was once the baby that she rocked to sleep, cuddled against her breast—is called to the firing line. No one who is not a woman can realize how ghastly the waiting at home may be. No one who is not a woman can know that each bullet leaves a wound in some mother's heart—even though the bullet may have been fired some thousand miles away.

War is a man's work, they say. Granted. But it is a woman's burden. For her it takes the sunshine out of the springtime, and the song out of the bird notes; for her it makes every scarlet flower loom blood-like against the ground. It turns gay little verses into tired editorials.

And yet, friends of mine, if war is here (and the papers say it is), if war is here, unavoidably, we must prepare to shoulder our cross. We must do our bit bravely for the boys who must answer their country's call; we must do more than pray for them—we must do our very best to make them physically and mentally strong. We must put our small vanities to one side, our small prejudices, our small whims. We must become really big enough to meet a huge situation.

It is a time when the women of America should be very close together. For our hearts are being pierced by the same needle, strung on the same cord; just as beads, variously colored and shaped, are pierced and strung. We should be very close indeed to each other, held by the common bond of sympathy and, above all, understanding.

And that is why, instead of giving gay little verses, I am instead giving a message, small though it may be, to my friends who are, in these troubled days, my sisters. And the message is this:

If we must give of the treasure of our hearts, let us give graciously, and—if possible—smilingly!

A Sheaf of Letters

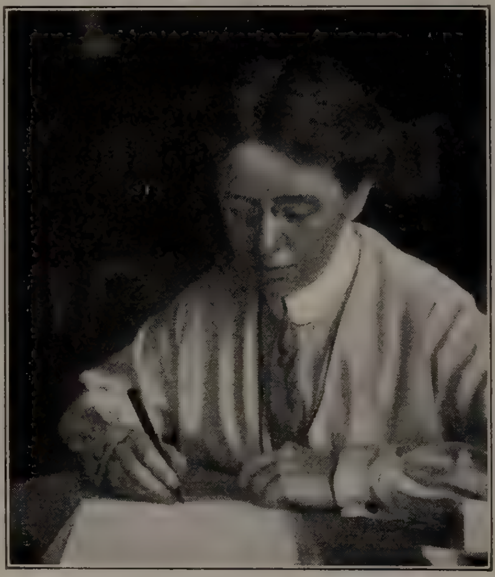
"I am a mother," writes E. K., "and I am worried about the present unrest of our beloved country. It seems almost certain that we will be involved in war, and war means the sacrificing of my dear sons and my husband. How my heart aches—not only for myself but for other mothers!

"It isn't that I am not patriotic, for I am intensely so, and I would gladly give my sons and husband if they were really needed to defend our nation. But I shudder to think of how much innocent blood may be shed, perhaps uselessly! My prayer, and the prayer of many others, is for peace, peace, peace."

An unsigned letter takes a stand opposite to E. K.'s.

"My father," it begins, "fought in the Civil War. I remember dimly seeing him march away. I sent my husband proudly to the Spanish-American War. The band played ragtime as his regiment marched through the city, and I smiled, though I wanted to cry. My son went to the border this summer and, perhaps because I am older now, I hated to see him go. For he was not used to the country, and there were many dangers. I suffered——

"And yet, if the country needs my son, I shall be glad to give him — to send him, if necessary, across the sea. And though he is my only child I shall be proud to have him do his bit in the trenches—the bit that his father and his grandfather were able to do."



Doing a Man's Work

Dr. S. Josephine Baker is one of the most widely known of the women physicians of this country. She is a member of the New York Academy of Medicine and has been for several years the director of the Bureau of Child Hygiene of the Department of Health. In a recent interview Dr. Baker said that the work of her department was devoted to preventing illnesses among children, and decreasing the infant mortality. During the past year (1916) there were 1,063 fewer deaths among babies under one year of age than there were in 1915, despite the fact that the city last summer was swept by the infantile paralysis epidemic.

Dr. Baker oversees the work of 655 physicians, school examiners, nurses and clerks. And, in her spare time—?

"I have a dear girl friend," writes P. E. R. "We have known each other since the day when she used to bring her dolls over to my house to play. We went to school together, then to college. And then we didn't see much of each other, for she went into business, and I got married.

"Now, through a strange chance, I have learned that this girl is going to do something that would be very wrong. Not morally wrong, perhaps, but against her best interests—and the best interests of others. A word to her from me—her old playmate—would, I know, cause her to make a decision that would be worthy of her mentality and firmness.

"And yet to say this word I would have to break the confidence of the one who told me the facts. I promised not to tell before I knew how vitally important and necessary it is to tell. What shall I do? Break my promise or desert my friend in her time of need?"

"Don't poison the baby—" is the sensational beginning of a letter sent out by the Child Betterment Bureau. "The press," it continues, "has recently reported one hundred and six cases of child-poisoning from the use of arsenical fly-destroyers. And this number is probably but a small fraction of the real number.

"There seems to be an inexplicable carelessness in the use of these deadly poisons, which is perhaps due to ignorance as to their real composition. But let us state that the poison paper you put in a saucer of water and set on the window sill, and the can with the poisoned wick, are both arsenic—one of the deadliest of poisons.

"The United States Government has taken notice of this apparently disregarded danger to the lives of little children, and issued the following warning in a public health service bulletin recently published. 'Of fly poisons mention should be made, merely for the purpose of condemnation, of those composed of arsenic. Fatal cases of poisoning of children through the use of such compounds are far too frequent, and, owing to the resemblance of arsenical poisoning to other diseases that children are subject to, we believe that the cases reported do not by any means comprise the total. Arsenical fly-destroying devices must, therefore, be rated as extremely dangerous, and should never be used, even if other measures are not at hand.'"

Home and Garden Hints

"The Home Garden."

A small volume, by the well-known garden authority, E. L. D. Seymour, B. S. A., contains many suggestions that would prove more than valuable to the woman—or man—who is interested, not only in flowers, but in improving the value of property. The book contains chapters on "The Home Garden," "The Elements of a Garden," "The Pleasures and Profits of a Garden," "The Accessories of a Garden," "Some Common Garden Fallacies," and "Practical Details of Garden-Making."

This is the day of the amateur gardener. Formerly he was impelled to self-imposed tasks of cultivation by several motives. A love of growing things, a fondness for the great outdoors, a profitable and pleasant mode of exercise—these and other elements combined transform many an urban dweller into an enthusiast of the soil.

But these troubled days have forced another consideration upon us. Economic conditions are creating amateur gardeners by the hundreds. More and more is every available space being utilized as an effective means of defeating the high cost of living.

"The Home Garden" is illustrated in full color and from photographs.

Do you know—

That red glass hastens vegetation? that gasoline kills dandelions? that salt will improve dusty garden paths? that earthworms loosen the soil and are therefore much to be desired in a garden? and that rusty trowels and other tools may be made almost like new by the application of sour milk whey? Do you know that moth balls hung on vines will repel insects? that it is easier to dig a small garden with a spoon than with a spade? and that weeding should only be done in dry, baking weather?

And do you know that sunflowers are the most grateful of any plants? They grow in poor soil, are bee pastures and bean poles while living, and make good kindling and hen food when they are mature.

Poison Ivy

Folk who are interested in gardening are often troubled with poison ivy. They will be glad to know that sour milk, mixed with a great deal of salt, will, if it is applied with soft cloths, relieve the pain and draw out the poison. A solution of very hot water which has been poured over bluestone will also draw out and kill the poison. Bluestone, however, is a poison and should be kept away from children.

Two Inexpensive and Very Good Cakes

A delicious fruit cake, which by reason of its economy will have a strong appeal, can be made by boiling together one cup of water; one cup of sugar; one-half cup of lard (or any other shortening); one teaspoonful each of cloves, nutmeg, and cinnamon; one cup of raisins, one cup of currants, and enough citron to taste. After this mixture has boiled for a few minutes take it from the stove and add two cups of flour into which a teaspoonful of soda and a pinch of salt have been sifted. Bake in a moderate oven.

A black chocolate cake, which invariably turns out well, is made by beating the yolk of one egg with a cup of sugar and one tablespoonful of butter to about two melted squares of chocolate. Add enough boiling water to fill half a cup; fill the rest of the cup with milk. To this mixture add one teaspoonful of soda in cold water, 1 teaspoonful of vanilla, a pinch of salt, and 1½ cups of flour. Bake in layercake tins and frost with a white coiled icing.

A Regiment Passes

EAGER, though half afraid, we stood along the street,
And, coming near, we heard the tramp of many marching feet;
We heard the thrilling beat of drums, the ringing sound of cheers;
And some of us looked up and smiled, and brushed away the tears!

Shopgirl and millionaire, we watched them as they came,
And some of us were white and crushed, and some were all aflame
With pride for them—our soldier boys—and some were cold with dread;
One woman stood with lifted chin, and one with drooping head.

Mother and new-made wife, together, wistful-eyed . . .
One of them touched me with her hand, and "There goes Jim!" she cried.
From back of me there came a voice that, shaking, tried to say:
"Quick, darling, look at daddy—quick! Before he goes away!"

Sweetheart and maiden aunt, we watched the columns go;
Some souls were touched with more than hope, some heartbeats faltered slow;
And "Au revoir,' one of us laughed, and "Dear, good-by!" one sobbed;
And all about us, like a mist, the thrilling drumbeats throbbed.

Eager and dim of eye, we stood along the street,
And watched them as they wheeled from sight. The sound of marching feet
Came like an echo from afar, an echo drenched in fears;
And some of us looked up and smiled . . . but through a veil of tears!

Preparing for the Miracle

SUNDAY, April 29. John 11 : 41. "And Jesus lifted up his eyes and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me." That is a very strange and unusual order. Lazarus is still in the grave, and the thanksgiving precedes the miracle of resurrection. I thought that the thanksgiving would have arisen when the great deed had been wrought, and Lazarus was restored to life again. But Jesus gives thanks for what he is about to receive. The gratitude breaks forth before the bounty has arrived, in the assurance that it is most certainly on the way. The song of victory is sung before the battle has been fought. It is the sower who is singing the song of harvest-home. It is thanksgiving before the miracle!

Now if we ever observed this order in our spiritual life we seem to have largely lost it. Sometimes, but I am afraid only very rarely, we gather for praise when the battle is over and we are surrounded by the visible spoils. We hold our thanksgiving service at the close of the campaign. We have counted our converts and we are ready to sing. But who thinks of sounding the silver trumpet before the mission begins, and of gathering a congregation for praise before a single convert is penitently knocking at the door? Who thinks of announcing a victory-psalm when the crusaders are just starting out for the field? Where can we hear the grateful song for the answer which has not yet been received?

And after all, there is nothing strange, or forced, or unreasonable in the Master's order. Praise is really the most vital preparatory ministry to the working of the miracle. Miracles of all kinds are wrought by spiritual power. Spiritual power is always proportioned. to our faith. And what is there which is so productive and expressive of faith as a pæan of thanksgiving before the deed has been wrought? There is nothing like thanksgiving for opening out all the highways and by-ways of the soul. Thanksgiving converts all the avenues of the soul into channels of divine grace and power. Even prayer cannot make the soul receptive without praise. Whenever there is prayer without praise we "limit the Holy One of Israel," and the consecrating power is restrained. The water of life is waiting, but the channels are choked.

What energy would possess our doings and our goings if we marched to our tasks in the triumphant spirit of assuring praise! Thanksgiving before the miracle—that is the order of Jesus. J. H. J.

From Strength to Strength

MONDAY, April 30. Ps. 84 : 7. "They go from strength to strength: every one of them in Zion appeareth before God." Our earliest prayers grow out of our earliest needs. In childhood we are conscious of no other needs than food and clothes and shelter. So we pray for these. Many a Christian's prayer never transcends this idea. Perhaps most prayers among savages, untaught tribes of non-Christian nations, are of this sort—prayers for circumstantial safety, for food and for protection from perils of the forest.

The school-child of twelve or fourteen outgrows this idea of God and asks for wisdom in study, for a quickened intelligence, for success in intellectual tasks.

Presently instead of the school-child there is a youth of twenty. He prays to the same God whom once he trusted to watch over him while he was asleep. But he is now anxious that he shall watch over him while he is awake; that he shall be kept open-eyed, morally pure, and fortified against the hour of unsuspected attack on his integrity.

Other years go by, and the youth of twenty is a man of forty. With the years have come heavier burdens and keener griefs. His idea of God has grown. He thinks of God as his Uttermost Friend.

Years go by, and age comes on. He turns to the Shepherd Psalm and from the recesses of a lowly spirit prays, "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me; I will fear no evil, because thou art with me." God is his Guide, his inseparable Companion. Thus we may go "from strength to strength" until we appear before God in Zion. C. C. A.

Redemption in Jesus' Death

TUESDAY, May 1. Heb. 9 : 16, 17. "Where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth." It seems a very human argument that the apostle advances in this place to show the necessity of the death of Jesus, but it explains in a striking manner the orderly plan which God has pursued in bringing about the redemption of the race. Man could hope for no gifts from the God whom he had offended and who had declared, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." But Jesus assumed to act in the place of sinners, to satisfy the claims of eternal righteousness by his holy living and his innocent death. He became the Go-between, the Mediator between the unrighteous world and the righteous Judge of the world. Whatever mercy God was to show to men, whatever grace he might extend to them, whatever help he would render them, all had to come through the agency of Jesus. Jesus came into the world to do the will of his Father. He could not change the terms of the eternal decree of redemption. He was not qualified to dispense forgiveness, life and salvation, except on the terms of the covenant of grace formulated by God. His death was one of those terms. Not until he has complied with this ultimate requirement of the retributive justice of God do the rich contents of that gracious covenant become available for men. His death seals that covenant and establishes the legality of the gracious will of God toward sinners in the heavenly courts as by probate.

The story of the Lord's passion is no pleasant tale; the scenes surrounding his death are shocking; it is an awful retribution that the world is invited to view in the agony of the Son of God. But out of all these bitter pains and shame is to come the joy and glory of the redeemed. While we bow in remorse before the Man of Sorrows, our faith hails the dying Jesus with intense gratitude: his death sets us up as happy heirs of the riches of divine grace. W. H. T. D.

Lending Unto the Lord

WEDNESDAY, May 2. I Sam. 1 : 28. "I have lent him to the Lord as long as he liveth." The name Hannah, often abbreviated into Anna, bears the lovely significance of graciousness. This noble mother of the child Samuel had promised her boy to the Lord before he was born, and longed to have him high priest of the tabernacle instead of the profligate sons of Eli, who were compelled to assist their father. Hannah, faithful to her vow, when her boy was four years old took him to Eli, saying, "I have lent him to the Lord as long as he liveth." Then she uttered a song of praise worthy to stand alongside Mary's Magnificat. Here are a few lines:

> "Joyful is my heart in Jehovah,
> For I have rejoiced in thy salvation,
> And no rock is as our God.
> He lifts from the dust the poor,
> To cause them to sit with nobles.
> He shall give strength to his King,
> And exalt the horn of his anointed."

Hannah, after patient waiting amid trials and sorrows, sees in her glorious vision her boy Samuel an honored ruler, priest and judge, an immortal being to be enjoyed by her forever. His usefulness in the kingdom of God was her greatest delight. Samuel ever reflected the beautiful devotion of his mother's character. How could he help being a grand man after such prayer, consecration and watchfulness of holy motherhood? Hannah has influenced all the after ages; Mary was inspired by her song to sing in still loftier strains. The motherhood of the world has ever been touched by the presentation of little Samuel unto the Lord in the tabernacle, and millions have followed the example. E. W. C.

All Things for Our Sakes

THURSDAY, May 3. II Cor. 4 : 15. "For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God." For our sakes he who was rich became poor. For our sakes he sanctified himself. The apostle includes every possible experience of earth in his "all things." If all things are for our sakes, then this must be the best possible world. Perhaps not yet, but it must be on the way to becoming the best possible world. The true Christian is neither an optimist nor a pessimist, but a meliorist. That is, he believes, in the light of just such words as these of Paul, that in time cruelty and crime and ignorance shall be cured, outgrown, conquered, left behind, and that a statelier man shall find his home in a statelier Eden.

It is easy to see how beauty is for our sakes, but not so easy to see how ugliness is for our sakes. And yet how could there be beauty without a background of ugliness? It is difficult to see how pain is for our sakes, and yet any doctor will testify that pain is benevolent in its purpose. It is easy to believe that life is for our sakes, but is death? Certainly, if death be but the gateway to a larger life, or if, as some one has strikingly said, "death be but God's answer to our prayer for more abundant life."

Superficially, it seems that a world without pain and sin and death would be a sorrowless world. Perhaps it would be, but yet would it not be a proud world, a godless world? There is much truth in that saying of Dante, "Sorrow remarries us to God." Some one wrote these lines, suggestive of the fact that suffering is for our sakes:

> "Through the dim close prison bars
> That shut thee from thy kind,
> God reaches down to make thee one with him."

The Conquering Jesus

FRIDAY, May 4. Matt. 21 : 9. "Hosanna to the Son of David: blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest." How fickle is the favor of men! Within the space of a few days our Lord was raised to the zenith of his earthly glory and hurled to his deepest shame. In the same city which greets him with the glad acclaim in our text he is a few days later surrounded by a frenzied mob that demands his crucifixion and hurries him to the gallows.

What an insane world, you say. Yes, that is the world with which every follower of Christ has to deal. What grace is needed to endure its garish lights and dark frowns! The Lord's conduct amid such scenes is a subject of absorbing interest. Calmly he goes about his work also on this his greatest day in Jerusalem. He goes straight to the temple, which from a center of light and a fountain of life had been turned into a seat of corruption and a den of murderers. Neither the praise nor the blame of men swerves him from his divine mission. He is come on business of the Most High. He is the promised Seed of David. Rightly the benediction of the faithful is bestowed on him, and the divine blessing besought that his work may prosper.

But how few of those who sang the Hosanna understood the full import of their own words! In lowly pomp and majesty they saw the Prince of Life ride to his death. They saw not the matchless obedience that prompted this last visit of his to the holy city, and his eager determination to do the will of his Father and to die in order to do it fully. He sits enthroned in glory now and from his throne of grace directs the fortunes of his church on earth. Despised as he was by men and facing the same opposition that was arrayed against him, the church pursues her mission of reclaiming men after the example of her Lord. In every trial of their faith the members of the church look up to the conquering Jesus, and their shout goes up to him: "Hosanna! Help now, O Lord; O Lord, send now prosperity; for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory!" W. H. T. D.

Delights of Good Humor

SATURDAY, May 5. Ps. 126 : 2. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our lips with singing." Is not humor one of the gifts of God to man, one of the distinguishing marks between man and the animal? Humor is associated with pathos, tenderness and affection. A person devoid of humor is less sought for by children and young people, and less welcomed in home and society. Humor gives brightness to the face, sunshine to the eyes, relieves the high tension of an argument or oration, and illuminates thought with its brightness.

Henry Ward Beecher and Abraham Lincoln were vastly superior because of their delightful humor; their power to take off the absurdities of a theory, or to make ludicrous the mistakes and evils of life, lay in their heart humor, as fragrance in the flower.

Happy is the man whose mouth is filled with innocent laughter, and his lips with praise. The children run to meet him; his presence is a delight in a sick-room, for his countenance is like the smiles of nature. Mr. Lincoln disarmed his enemies and delighted his friends by his charming pleasantry; he sent men away from his presence almost as pleased as if he had granted their requests.

During the awful burdens of the war, he would exclaim, "If it were not for an occasional joke, I should die." Often at midnight he would be found sitting on the edge of John Hay's bed, reading to him an amusing story. It was the same gentle spirit that led him to play with the children on the lawn of the White House.

There is no incongruity between laughter and the solemn hours of sorrow, or the higher delights of spiritual pleasure. This oil of gladness makes smoother all the pathways of life. Pain and pleasure often flow together; they are twin influences that aid each other amid all changing scenes. May we not consider cheer a life-preserver upon the sea of time?

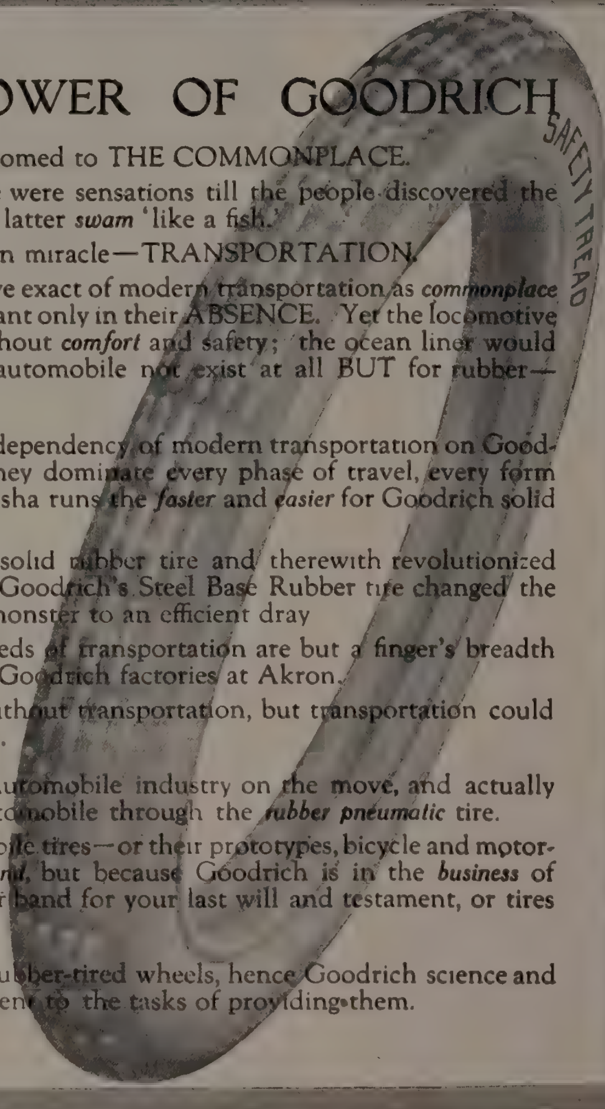
SILVERTOWN CORDS SAFETY TREAD TIRES BICYCLE TIRES CARRIAGE TIRES AIR BRAKE HOSE

GOODRICH



THE MOTIVE POWER OF GOODRICH

WHATEVER "looks easy" is doomed to THE COMMONPLACE.

The air ship and the submarine were sensations till the people discovered the former flew 'just like a bird' and the latter swam 'like a fish.'

The same drab fate besets the modern miracle—TRANSPORTATION.

SPEED, COMFORT and SAFETY we exact of modern transportation as commonplace rights of travel. They become important only in their ABSENCE. Yet the locomotive would jolt along at a snail's pace without comfort and safety; the ocean liner would waddle like a land crab; and the automobile not exist at all BUT for rubber—GOODRICH RUBBER.

WORDS can not exaggerate the dependency of modern transportation on Goodrich and Goodrich rubber They dominate every phase of travel, every form of portage. Even the Japanese jinriksha runs the faster and easier for Goodrich solid rubber tires.

Incidentally Goodrich made the first solid rubber tire and therewith revolutionized the whole carriage industry; just as Goodrich's Steel Base Rubber tire changed the auto truck from a clumsy, wasteful monster to an efficient dray

Yet Goodrich's fulfillment of the needs of transportation are but a finger's breadth in the span of the day's work of the Goodrich factories at Akron.

Goodrich would still be Goodrich without transportation, but transportation could not be MODERN without Goodrich.

GOODRICH literally keeps the automobile industry on the move, and actually insures the existence of the automobile through the rubber pneumatic tire.

Yet Goodrich does not make automobile tires—or their prototypes, bicycle and motorcycle tires—because of a mere demand, but because Goodrich is in the business of providing rubber, whether it is a rubber band for your last will and testament, or tires for your automobile

The horseless carriage had to have rubber-tired wheels, hence Goodrich science and experience in rubber automatically bent to the tasks of providing them.

SUBMARINE SUPPLIES FAIR LIST PRICES

GOODRICH to begin evolved the single tube; next the first clincher tire, the type in use today; and finally drafting its thread fabric principle from Goodrich bicycle tire experience, produced the SILVERTOWN CORD TIRE, introducing alone and ahead and still the ONLY two-ply, cable-cord tire, fastest and most durable of tires. And further, the debt the automobile owes Goodrich piles up in auto bumpers, horn bulbs, mats, battery jars, scores of hard rubber parts, wire and tubings.

GOODRICH rubber is MASTER of transportation on land; MISTRESS on sea. You are shuttled in safety and comfort between New York and San Francisco on a lightning express train, and Goodrich rubber is doing its part from the head-light of the locomotive to the tail of the last coach. Rubber packing tripling the power, rubber valves resisting hot and cold water in the engine, and hose and tubing of a dozen different kinds and uses, make the GREAT MOGUL the miracle of speed it is.
Throughout the train rubber buffers, rubber matting, inlaid tiling, and a score of rubber ingenuities serve your comfort. The cheery brightness of electric lights would be wanting without Goodrich Axle Lighting belt, and the safety of the air brake without Goodrich Air Brake hose.
Travel to sea, and the Goodrich rubber goes with you in marine deck hose, collapsible buckets, rubber boots, storm coats, packing, electrical wire and transmission belts.
The dreadnaught could not plow the waves; nor the submarine dive into the deep; nor the hydroplane ride the waves without Goodrich rubber.

THE progress of transportation for half a century is written in the progress of Goodrich and Goodrich rubber.
Goodrich rubber has taken the shock of vibration; softened jars and concussions; provided comfort and safeguarded life; shielded delicate mechanism from ruin and hardier machinery from wear and tear.

ALL because the DUTY of rubber to the world is the duty of the House of Goodrich.
Whatever is needed in rubber, Goodrich will make it FIRST and make it BEST.
Because Goodrich rubber has put comfort, safety, speed and economy in transportation, Goodrich IS rubber to the transportation part of the world.

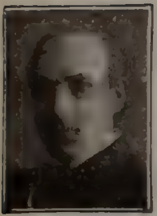
How to Remove the Cause of Dangerous Indigestion

By R. W. Lockwood



Eugene Christian

IF I were asked to sound a health warning that would be the greatest possible benefit to mankind, I should say emphatically—"Beware of acid stomach." For acid stomach is the cause of fermentation which, bad enough in itself, is the forerunner of a hundred ills that sap the energy and vitality of its victims. I venture to say that ninety per cent. of all sickness starts with acid stomach.

The combinations of food eaten at the average American breakfast are capable of forming a chemical reaction that would almost blow a glass retort into bits.

Nature provides hydrochloric acid as one of the digestive fluids, but too much of this acid causes fermentation, hurries the food out of the stomach and carries the acid all through the body. As a consequence, poisons (toxins) are formed which are absorbed into the blood, causing auto-intoxication, nervousness, mental depression and countless ills of which this is but the beginning.

Every one of the vital organs in time becomes affected —the heart, the liver, the kidneys, the intestines, the nerves and the brain all decline, for the stomach is the Power Plant of the body. Even the teeth are affected by acid stomach, for the gums recede and pyorrhoea is apt to be the result.

Stomach remedies only neutralize the acid because they are stronger than the acid. This ultimately ruins the lining of the stomach. The acid being neutralized is absorbed into the blood only to come back to the stomach in greater quantities at the next meal.

How much more sensible would it be to attack this disorder at its source! Instead of attempting to neutralize the acid after it has formed, why not prevent it from forming in the first place?

Superacidity is caused by wrong eating and the remedy must be found in the field of the cause—in eating correctly.

The individual sufferer from indigestion, acidity, fermentation, gas and such disorders has not carried his experiments with food very far. If he had he could easily cure himself, as Eugene Christian, the famous food scientist, has proved beyond all doubt.

The reason which led Eugene Christian to take up the study of food in the first place was because he himself, as a young man, was a great sufferer from stomach and intestinal trouble.

So acute was his affliction that the best specialists of the day, after everything within their power had failed, gave him up to die. Educated for a doctor himself, Christian could get no help from his brother physicians.

Believing that wrong eating was the cause and that right eating was the only cure, he took up the study of foods and their relation to the human system. What he learned not only restored his own health in a remarkably short space of time, but has been the means of relieving some 25,000 other men and women for whom he has prescribed with almost invariable success, even though most of them went to him as a last resort.

Christian says that all stomach and intestinal disorders —with their countless sympathetic ills—are caused by wrong selections and wrong combinations of food, and that right combinations of food will positively remove every stomach and intestinal disorder by removing its causes.

No one would think of putting salt into an open wound, and yet we do worse than that when we keep putting irritating acid-creating food combinations into our stomachs already surcharged with acid.

The word diet is one which has an unpleasant sound—it makes us think of giving up all the things we like for those we have no taste for. But Eugene Christian's method is entirely different—instead of asking his patients to give up the things they enjoy, he prescribes menus which are twice as enjoyable as those to which the patient is accustomed. Christian believes in good foods deliciously cooked—the kind all of us like best and which may be obtained at any home store, hotel or restaurant. He says that most of the things we eat are all right — but that we don't know how to combine or balance them.

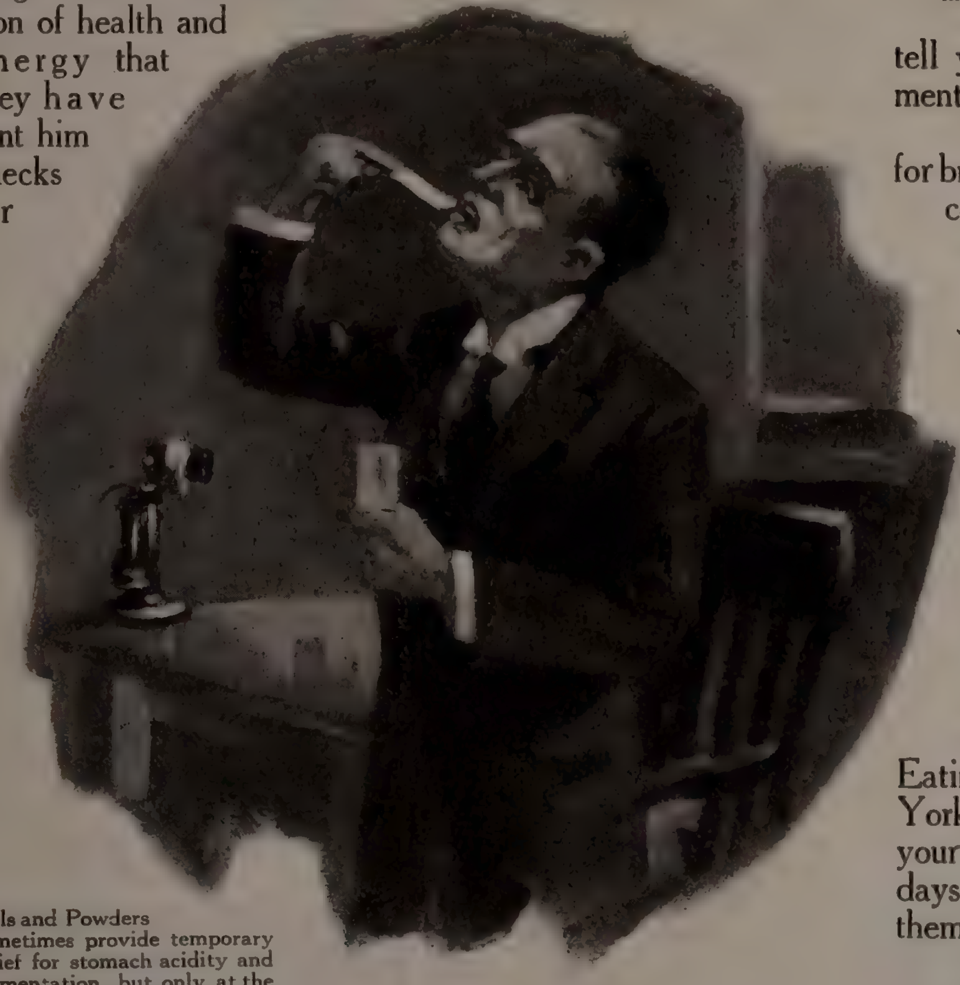
Often, one food good in itself, when combined with another equally good food, produces an acid reaction in the stomach; whereas either of the foods alone or eaten in combination with some other food would have been easily and perfectly digested.

Unfortunately, each food we eat at a meal is not digested separately. Instead, all of the foods we combine at the same meal are mixed and digested together. Consequently, if we eat two or more articles at the same meal which don't go well together, there is sure to be acidity, fermentation, gas and all kinds of digestive trouble.

The average dinner, according to an authority, causes more failures in life than any other one thing.

At Eugene Christian's New York office there is a constant stream of men and women who go to him for treatment after they have tried everything else, and rarely are they disappointed in the outcome. Some of the results he has attained read like fairy tales. I know of a number of instances where his rich patrons have been so grateful for their restoration of health and energy that they have sent him checks for $500 or $1,000 in addition to the amount of the bill when paying it. There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a course of little lessons which tell you exactly what to eat in order to overcome the ailment which is troubling you.



Pills and Powders sometimes provide temporary relief for stomach acidity and fermentation, but only at the expense of our resistive powers.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering all conditions of health and sickness, including stomach acidity, constipation and all intestinal disorders, from infancy to old age, and all occupations, climates and seasons. They also tell you how to reduce and how to gain. With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist, because every possible point is so thoroughly covered and clearly explained that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will remove the causes of your disorder the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal.

If you would like to examine these 24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, simply write The Corrective Eating Society, Inc., Dept. 344, 450 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely ask them to send the lessons on five days' trial with the understanding that you will either return them within that time or remit $3, the small fee asked.

Jesus the Servant of All

International Sunday School Lesson for May 6
John 13 : 1-17

The Supremacy of Service

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

TODAY we begin the study of those great chapters in John where Jesus prepares his disciples for their task after his crucifixion. It is a sad commentary on human nature that they were so unready of spirit as they met in that upper room. Luke tells us that there was a contention among them as to which was the greatest.

John intimates that not one of them was willing to stoop to perform the customary washing of the feet. It was an awkward moment. All were proud and uneasy. Their usual fellowship was broken. And this when for the last time they were to enjoy the company of the Master and listen to his words of comfort and advice. To be sure, they did not know that this was to be the Last Supper. How seldom we know when we are having our last chance with some dear one, or our final opportunity to help some tempted soul!

How to Soften Proud Hearts

Jesus looked round on haughty faces. This would never do. He must transform the whole atmosphere. How wisely he worked! He himself quietly went over to the pitcher and filled the basin with water. With every eye fastened upon him he knelt and began to wash their feet. The silence was painful. Not one of them could find a word to say till impulsive Peter was reached.

Jesus accomplished his purpose.

"From a group of angry, proud, insolent, implacable, resentful men, they were in five minutes changed into a company of humbled, meek, loving disciples of the Lord, each thinking hardly of himself and esteeming others better. They were effectually cleansed from the stain they had contracted, and could enter on the enjoyment of the Last Supper with pure conscience, with restored and increased affection for one another, and with deepened adoration for the marvelous wisdom and all-accomplishing grace of their Master."—Marcus Dods.

A Wordless Rebuke

We need to imitate Jesus in dealing with the frequent misunderstandings that arise in church and home alike. "A soft answer turneth away wrath"; and ofttimes without a word, for words are dangerous and tricky, we can do just the thing that will melt the proudest heart. Oh for more tact and grace and sanctified common sense to know the secret of conciliating and winning a brother offended!

Jesus won this victory without uttering a word.

One deed of thoughtful kindness, "heaping coals of fire" on the head of the mean and the wilful, counts more than any amount of argument or protestation of friendship.

Humility in the Consciousness of Power

What a remarkable verse John wrote to introduce this story of humble service! "Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he came forth from God and goeth unto God" . . . "began to wash the disciples' feet." In the full consciousness of his divine mission, knowing that he was on the threshold of his return to glory, he performed the task of a servant and felt no incongruity. To us there may be a great contrast, but not to him.

Little men are touchy about their dignity, but really great men are not concerned. They are quietly sure of themselves, and no honorable act can lower them. Real princes of God can stoop to menial tasks without losing the unseen halo.

Dr. Muhlenburg, the great Episcopal clergyman and philanthropist of New York, was always willing to be useful in an emergency. Once when visiting St. Luke's Hospital, he was encountered by a friend in the act of carrying a big tray of steaming dishes down a corridor. His friend remonstrated, but Dr. Muhlenburg answered, "I am only a waiter in the Lord's Hotel." Deacon is the Greek word for waiter. In Mark 10:43 Jesus said, "Whosoever would be great among you shall be your waiter." He also said that he had not come to be waited upon but to wait on others.

If we know the true greatness of our calling as sons of God we shall not be ashamed of the humblest service. But when we are anxious for place and preferment we have forgotten whose we are and whom we serve.

Peter's Frankness

We must confess to a fondness for Peter. He never hesitated to say what he thought, and while he made some sorry blunders thereby he also said some fine things. Here he is, the old outspoken fisherman and the eager loving disciple by turns.

The rest accepted the washing in silence with downcast eyes and shamed hearts. Peter couldn't keep still and let the Lord of Glory play the slave to him. He blurts out, "What, you wash my feet!" Jesus answers that he will understand the meaning of the incident by and by. "Thou shalt never wash my feet," exclaims the impetuous one.

In effect, Jesus says, "If you can't let me do something for you, even this washing away of dust, what sort of friends and partners are we after all?" Then Peter has a flash of insight. He sees the washing as a symbol of cleansing of their selfish spirits. "Lord," he says, "if that's what it means, wash not my feet only, but also my hands and my head."

So we feel. We need cleansing of our hands to do his will, of our minds to think his thoughts, as well as of our feet to walk in his ways.

True Friendship Must Accept Service

Jesus was glad to soothe at once their weary feet and their ruffled feelings. He will do as much for us. There is so much to disturb, to becloud the joy of our salvation. When we come to the communion of his table let us relax all our pride. Let us be willing to have him cool our brows and wash away our stains.

Friends of Jesus must be willing to accept his service. Spiritual pride holds us back when he would gladly minister unto us.

Just in the same way we ought to be willing to receive good gifts at the hands of our brethren. Strange as it may seem, lots of good Christians don't know how to accept kindness. They are "stingy receivers," which is almost as bad as stingy givers. You are not my friend if you cannot let me do the least favor for you.

There is a real grace in welcoming the ministrations of friends. Jesus knew how to accept as well as to give. He made Zaccheus and Levi happy by welcoming their hospitality. He never lost dignity by being willing to allow people to help him. He accepted graciously when his friends contributed to his needs.

The Master as Servant

Jesus Christ began the transformation of labor. He called God a worker when men had thought of him as an idle tyrant. He regarded the Almighty as the Chief Servant of the universe, ministering to all its needs. He started the movement to abolish slavery by introducing service. Slavery is loveless and therefore joyless. Service is loving, and therefore joyful, work. Slavery is degrading, but service is uplifting. Loving willingness makes the difference.

One man does his allotted task with loathing, in blindness and resentment. Another performs the same duties with insight and spirit, forgetting the burden in the joy of furthering the enterprise in hand. Thus the same task may be slavery or opportunity. Blessed is the man who loves his job.

How Much Do You Really Use Prayer?

If you were in debt, and about to be married, would you pray about it and expect to have the debt paid before your wedding day?

Does God send dreams in answer to prayer?

If you were in a foreign mission field, and the best Christian physicians told you that you could not live there because of your health, would you expect God to reverse their decision?

If you were a Christian farmer and the locusts were eating up the crops of your non-Christian neighbors, would you expect God to keep the locusts away from your crops in answer to prayer?

If you could not find the verse of a hymn that you wanted, would it occur to you to pray for it?

Why should God save the lives of some Christian missionaries in a time of massacre, such as the Boxer uprising in China, while the life-blood of other Christian missionaries was poured out? Does your own study of God's Word and your personal experience give you a satisfactory answer to this question?

Will God heal tuberculosis in answer to prayer?

Would it be right for a mother to ask God to stop a rain storm so that the children can catch a train to get to boarding-school?

Do you expect God to be personally interested in giving your children apples to eat when you cannot afford to buy them?

Ought we to trouble God with prayer about such a commonplace matter as the family sewing?

If you were a missionary, and the Lord spared the life of a sick child of a native Christian in answer to your prayer, while your own child, for whom you prayed, died, what would you think about prayer?

Mr. and Mrs. Jonathan Goforth are two missionaries for whose ministry in China and in Canada thousands of souls, in Heaven and on earth, are praising God today.

For years past they have been using prayer in their daily life much as the average person uses the telephone.

The One at the other end of the prayer-phone has answered.

But strange to say, when some of the results of these prayer messages have been told to Christians in the home-land, they have been met with incredulity.

Mrs. Goforth had borne in upon her the thought that, if her telling of isolated answers to prayer did not convince, perhaps the concentrated testimony of a life-time might bring belief. And, though she greatly shrank from such publicity, she has accepted God's leading and had brought together, out of her own and her husband's personal experiences, one of the most remarkable prayer documents of our generation.

Christianity has made the work of the teacher, the nurse, the physician supremely honorable. It shall yet remedy the error of considering the position of servant in the home degrading. Any one who cares for our children and our homes is deserving of at least equal respect with those who care for our letters or our money in the business office.

Eventually, when God's Kingdom comes, all toil shall be service. From street-cleaner and errand boy to bank president and captain of industry, the new love of man in the light of Christian brotherhood shall work its transformations.

The Great Example

The Master said, "I am among you as one that serveth."

Here he proves it in the most wonderful beautifying of a commonplace everyday household rite of Palestine. It is a foreshadowing of the discipleship that can "sweep a room to the glory of God." No human ministry is common or unclean. A gracious woman cleansing the hideous wound of the soldier is an incarnation of Christ.

He does not ask any of us to do what he would not do himself. Teacher and Lord he was and is. But he set the example of humble, personal, devoted service. If we would share his serene joy we must follow in his steps.

A Secret of Happiness

Not in knowing but in doing. Most of us are convinced that he spoke the absolute truth. Not yet have we acted out to the full his way of life. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

The great servants of God all possessed the higher happiness, that which Jesus calls blessedness, because they entered this secret of their Lord, even the joy of service.

Presenting the Lesson

I. To a younger class. Picture the upper room, prepared for the last farewell supper; the dusty, sandaled feet; no servant to wash them. The proud Christians, wrangling about pre-eminence. The humble Lord, saying little, doing the common work. The disciples ashamed of themselves, Peter's words of loyalty.

Lessons: Willingness to help in the home. What tasks correspond to the one Jesus did? The sin of haughtiness. What would Jesus do?

II. Bible Class Discussion. The True Test of Greatness.

1. Old and New Ideals. (a) Power, pride, wealth. The Cæsars and Crœsuses. (b) Service, love, ministry. Livingstone, Florence Nightingale. (In a French ballot Louis Pasteur far ahead of Napoleon as greatest Frenchman, the man who saved lives above the man who selfishly sacrificed them.)

2. The Democracy of Jesus. God as Chief Servant, Christ with basin and towel. So of nation's President, the people's servant. What will this mean in industry?

3. How do we measure up? Consider what we get out of world-food from every clime, shelter, knowledge, enjoyment. What are we contributing to the common welfare? How great are we?

The Extra Features

You will find in the Mitchell 31 features which nearly all cars omit. On this year's output they will cost us about $4,000,000.

They are paid for by factory savings, due to John W. Bate. He has spent millions of dollars and years of time to minimize our factory cost.

He built and equipped this mammoth plant to build this one type economically. For less than anyone else could build it. The results show in these extra values, which we ask you to see.

The Extra Beauty

This year we occupy our new body plant. By applying Mr. Bate's methods it affords another big saving. Out of that saving we add 24 per cent to the cost of finish, upholstery and trimming.

See the new, enduring finish that results. See the extra-grade leather, the deep cushion springs, the light in the tonneau, the locked compartment, etc.

See the new-style bodies, each a Mitchell creation. Our experts examined 257 models before designing these.

The Extra Strength

In the past three years we have doubled our margins of safety. The present Mitchell standard is 100 per cent over-strength in every vital part.

Over 440 parts are built of toughened steel. All safety parts are vastly oversize. We use a wealth of Chrome-Vanadium steel.

The result, we believe, is a lifetime car. We have proved that Mitchells can run over 200,000 miles.

Go see the results. See them in Mitchell Junior—our amazing $1150 Six. See them in the larger Mitchell, combining every known attraction. You will find no values like them in fine cars.

Giving Good Service—Gaining Good Will This is the Saxon "Six" Record

It is one thing to give good service when new.

It is quite another and greater thing to continue to give good service after thousands of miles of use.

Though the first wins your good will, the second holds it—and deepens it.

It is this enduring quality of Saxon "Six" that gives permanency to your satisfaction in its performance.

It offers a rugged resistance to the never-ceasing attack of road and weather long after cars of lesser strength have succumbed.

Its power-flow retains practically its original quietness and smoothness. Its easy-riding, even-driving quality is undiminished.

There seems to be no lessening of its amazing flexibility, no slowing down in its swift pick-up.

So that the good will Saxon "Six" gains at the start by its ability to give good service is retained and intensified by its ability to continue that good service, day after day, month after month, season after season.

AMERICAN FLAG
For All Occasions

HAVE you a good United States Flag for use on holidays—in fact on any day during these strenuous times? If not, here is an opportunity to get one—a well made flag, 4 x 6 feet.

Some time ago we decided to make a special flag offer to our readers. Thousands of these flags were placed in Christian Herald homes throughout the country. Perhaps we ordered too many, or perhaps the particular occasion for which flags were wanted had gone by. At any rate, we were left with a few fine flags on hand, but now is the time when every good American should be able to display "Old Glory."

The illustration is an exact photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. It is made by the Dunkards, of Pennsylvania. To insure durability, the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent, bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. The pole is NOT included.

SPECIAL OFFER

We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal), all for $3.00.

SPECIAL OFFER

We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, to any present subscriber who will send us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

IT is possible that some people who attend a meeting in a Billy Sunday campaign may be a little bit shocked by the manner in which prayer is offered. In the nineteen centuries since our Lord first gave us a pattern for prayer, we have become accustomed to a formal method of expression which, to many of us, appears the only reverent avenue of approach to the Father. When, therefore, Mr. Rodeheaver or Mr. Sunday speak to God just as if he were an old friend, and talk to him in the same language in which they might address an earthly friend, some of us gasp. But if we watch the crowd, we will soon discover that Billy's prayer has brought tears to eyes that had sworn to remain dry, and has moved hearts that thought they were steeled against the Spirit. Formal prayers are right and proper, without doubt. But, after all, prayer is only conversation with the heavenly Father, and it is equally right to express the cry of our hearts in the common speech of our tongues, for the Father hears and answers not the word we speak, but the longing of our hearts which forces the utterance.

W. H. S., Watertown, N. Y., writes, apropos of the revival in New York: "I am looking for a mighty work in our biggest city. Get all the Christian Herald Family to pray mightily, not only for New York City, but for the wide, wide world. Get the churches praying if you can, and our God will open the windows of heaven and pour out his Spirit in power and blessing."

Our mail this week is again full of thankful letters. C. E. S. is thankful for the election in answer to prayer of a worthy man as a selectman at their town meeting.

Mrs. M. writes to thank God for an outpouring of the Spirit upon Mayfield Center, Ohio, for which the Christian people had long been praying. The prayer was answered in the coming of a Christlike pastor, and the people, who had been trying to work out their own salvation, were quickened to newness of life.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. E., Buffalo, N. Y., express their gratitude to the League for prayers in behalf of their son, who was confined to the hospital with scarlet fever. They had prayed that the Lord might give them a token of his favor through the means of a letter from their boy, which prayer was granted, and the dear son is now at home with his parents, praising God.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Lowryville, S. C.; Mineville, N. Y; Adams, Neb.; St. Louis, Mo.: Murdock, Minn.; Jerseyville, Ill.; Marshall, Texas (that many may be saved during revival); Boyne City, Mich. (that many may be saved during revival meetings at the Presbyterian Church); Thomasville, N. C. (at Fair Grove Church).

Mrs. A. R. T., Coffeeville, Miss., requests prayer that a pastor may be sent to the church at that place.

Three parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; Miss. H. M., that mother's mind may be restored; ten friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves, friends or relatives.

Mrs. M. S. H. asks prayer that the sight of an eye may be restored; L. E. W., that son's sight may be restored; twelve friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends, relatives or themselves.

Forty-two friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Three parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. O. S., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. W. L., that a doctor may be cured of the liquor habit; five others ask that other relatives or friends may be delivered from this habit.

Three parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the drug habit; G. P. S. asks prayer to be cured of the drug habit.

Twenty-two parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including Mrs. M. S., that son

The Ministry of Helpfulness

By Mrs. A. H. EVANS, President of the Order of King's Daughters and Sons

"NOT to be ministered unto, but to minister," the motto of the International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons, is frequently quoted by the order's members and friends. What is its meaning and significance? Thirty-one years ago the devoted women who formed the order eagerly responded to this message of ministration. Their first response was in the Ministry of Help. Charity and the giving of alms were the outward manifestation of the inward spirit.

"Charity" means "love," so there followed closely in the order the Ministry of Love. This love was expressed for lonely old age, in homes where care and tenderness are given to those who have come to the end of life and are desolate. Love for the suffering sick, who have no hope of health this side of heaven, is also shown in some of the work of the order.

The Ministry of Healing comes close to this labor of love. This ministry is given in the form of hospitals, clinics, visiting nurses, fresh air and convalescent homes and sickroom helps, all bearing our Maltese cross and the precious words, "In His Name."

Then it came to the Ministry of Education and the order became a center for the distribution of light in dark places. Night schools, reading rooms, scholarships and kindergartens are supported and served by wearers of the silver cross.

The order also accepted the Ministry of Responsibility, and there came into being social centers, settlements, factory inspection, child-welfare work, parks and playgrounds. And every member of the order is responsible, just as far as her influence can be felt, for righteous laws and a law-abiding community.

The Ministry of the Evangel is the greatest and best of the order's ministries. Hearts innumerable have been lifted to a knowledge of a personal Saviour through the influence of those who are ministering "In His Name."

The greater part of the order's membership is in the United States and Canada, but it has members in other lands. Members unite in local circles, which combine to form city and county Unions and state Branches. Each Circle being independent in its choice of work, the result is that the order has a share in almost every phase of religious, educational and philanthropic effort. Hundreds of institutions are supported by Circles, Unions and Branches, in addition to the aid given to individuals and in cooperation with other helpful agencies.

The next Biennial General Convention of the order will be held in Philadelphia in May, 1918. Inquiries concerning the organization are always welcomed at the order's headquarters, 280 Madison Avenue, New York City.

BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

HOURS OF ENTERTAINMENT

A DEEPER BIBLE KNOWLEDGE

A LARGE CASH REWARD

The Joy of It

CAN you conceive of a more delightful pastime than one which combines hours of pleasure, a means of obtaining a deeper Bible knowledge, and the possibility of earning a large cash reward? The Second Bible Picture Study furnishes all of these and more. It will be a welcome friend in your home to cheer, elevate, and inspire you. Often we need some form of recreation which will drive cares and worries from our minds. Too often we choose our fun indiscriminately—that is, we squander time uselessly at some amusement place, or by reading a book that has no true value. Here's an opportunity that is beneficial and inspiring, founded as it is upon the Bible.

A Gentle Guide

The Study is as if some leader were to take you gently by the hand and lead you into new fields of pleasure and uplift. Imagine, if you can, the spiritual profit of examining sixty pictures illustrating verses in the Bible, and choosing verses from the Holy Scriptures which interpret the meaning of these pictures. Scenes of any kind are usually interesting—and these Bible pictures, far from being an exception in this respect, are so fascinating that you will want to choose all the Bible verses which apply to them immediately upon seeing them. Three of them are printed on this page.

Remuneration

Rewards in this Study are threefold. We have mentioned the fact that a deeper insight and love of the Bible is instilled by it. Add to these the fact that we are offering large cash Rewards. By "large" we mean that the person sending in the list containing the greatest number of best answers will receive $1,000.00.

Are You Sowing Seeds ?

WE asked our readers, in the March 7th issue, to help us sow the seeds of Bible knowledge—and we offered an immediate and concrete reward to those who would do so.

Have you given those four coupons out to friends? Or do you want more coupons? Turn back to your March 7th issue, pages 278 and 279, and read about the plan again. Or send in for more coupons—we will gladly furnish you as many as you desire. Read page 279 carefully—we stand back of our offer made there.

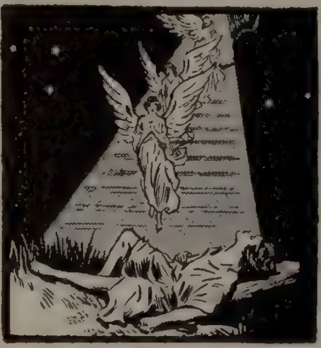
More Fascinating Than This Example

Just a taste of the delightfulness of the Study can be furnished by the accompanying example. Look carefully at this picture, and endeavor to choose from the following verses one that fulfils its meaning: while all may not be quite so obvious as this example illustration, every one is clear and plain.



Sample Picture

And he said, Hear thou therefore the word of the Lord; I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left. I Kings 22 : 19.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen. 28 : 12.

How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days. Matt. 12 : 12.

Surely it is an easy problem to choose a verse to fit this picture. The second verse, undoubtedly, is the one most applicable. You chose it, didn't you?

Young People's Topics for May 6

Boy Dreamers as World Builders

Epworth League Topic. (Gen. 37 : 5-11; 41 : 39-41.)

"OH, he's only a dreamer." This sentence is often spoken in derision of some young man or woman whose visions appear impossible to those who consider themselves more practical. Yet the progress of the world is only the working out of the visions of dreamers. Joseph was called a dreamer. His dreams were prophetic of the service he was to render, not only to his family, but to the civilization of his day. But his brothers misunderstood his dreams, perhaps understood as little as did he himself at the time, and because they could not understand they hated him for having dreams, and placed him in the way of realization by attempting to get rid of him.

Dreaming is the most worth-while of youthful occupations, if it is dreaming with a purpose. Idle dreams that carry no inspiration to action are worse than useless. But dreams that include a purpose shape the destinies of men and women. The young Garfield, treading the tow-path, dreamed of education and of leadership, and attained both. In every school and college of the country, young men and women are held to their tasks by the glorious vision of what they intend to be and to do, and every year those who have remained true to their visions are making good in the pulpit and press, in business, and on the far-flung battle-line where Christianity is writing liberty and love into the constitutions of ancient heathendoms.

Love (Consecration Meeting)

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. (I Cor. 13 : 1-13.)

LOVE is the passion that links humanity with the divine. God so loved the world that he gave his Son to redeem it. And his passion that moved the Creator to the utmost sacrifice for his creation has ennobled the race of men throughout the ages. It has been the force that has raised humanity above the dust from which it was formed. A love that is worth anything is a consuming passion that burns away every barrier and that meets the greatest obstacle only to overcome it. Sacrifice in the flame of love is transmuted into privilege, duty becomes desire, self is forgotten, and all the power of our being is concentrated into one force, the driving force of an all-pervading passion. We love our country, and at our country's call we give all that we have, even our life itself. But our country is only part of the Kingdom of God, and the whole is greater than any of its parts. Shall we then love God less than our country? Shall we offer him less than we are willing to give to our flag? God gave his choicest treasure for our redemption. Shall we give him less than our lives in return?

To Advertise the Gospel

THE Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church has become the custodian of an entirely new sort of missionary fund. A certain gentleman, whose name is not given, has offered to give $5,000 in case $50,000 is raised in order that a fair trial may be made of newspaper publicity regarding the Gospel in Japan, Korea and China. And he has offered $15,000 in addition in case the fund of $1,000,000 is contributed by all Christians for this evangelistic publicity in all nations outside the United States. The latter fund is to be permanent, the income being used for the publicity work. It is not in any sense a Methodist fund, the intention being that the advertising shall represent all denominations and all lovers of the Lord. It is planned to use the columns of the secular weekly newspapers of the world to reach great multitudes of readers who could not be reached in any other way, and it is expected that the advertising will be blessed of God with fruitful results.

He went to Egypt with us last year, and to Alaska the year before."

"How old is he?"

"Old? Why, I don't know—thirty—maybe more. He must be a little more, come to think of it. But you never think of age with the doctor. He'll be young when he's ninety."

"And you like him—so well?" Her voice was a little wistful.

"Next to dad—always have. You'll like him, too. You can't help it. He's mighty interesting."

"And he's a doctor?"

"Yes, and no. Oh, he graduated and hung out his shingle; but he never practiced much. He had money enough, anyway, and he got interested in scientific research—antiquarian, mostly, though he's done a bit of mountain-climbing and glacier-studying for the National Geographic Society."

"Antiquarian? Oh, yes, I know—old things. Mother was that way, too. She had an old pewter plate, and a dark blue china teapot, homely as a hedge fence, I thought, but she doted on 'em. And she doted on ancestors, too. She had one in that old ship—Mayflower, wasn't it?"

Burke laughed.

"Mayflower! My dear child, the Mayflower is a mere infant-in-arms in the doctor's estimation. The doctor goes back to prehistoric times for his playground, and to the men of the old Stone Age for his preferred playmates."

"Older than the Mayflower, then?"

"A trifle—some thousands of years."

"Goodness! How can he? I thought the Mayflower was bad enough. But what does he do—collect things?"

"Yes, to some extent; he has a fine collection of Babylonian tablets, and—"

"Oh, I know—those funny little brown and yellow cakes like soap, all cut into with pointed little marks—what do you call it?—like your father has in his library!"

"The cuneiform writing? Yes. As I said, the doctor has a fine collection of tablets, and of some other things; but principally he studies and goes on trips. It was a trip to the Spanish grottoes that got him interested in the archeological business in the first place, and put him out of conceit with doctoring. He goes a lot now, sometimes independently, sometimes in the interest of some society. He does in a scientific way what dad and I have done for fun—traveling and collecting, I mean. Then, too, he has written a book or two which are really authoritative in their line. He's a great chap—the doctor is. Wait till you see him. I've told him about you, too."

"Then you told him—that is—he knows—about the marriage."

"Why, sure he does!" Burke's manner was a bit impatient. "What do you suppose, when he's coming here to-night? Now, mind, put on your prettiest frock and your sweetest smile. I want him to see why I married you," he challenged banteringly. "I want him to see what a treasure I've got. And say, dearie, do you suppose—could we have him to dinner, or something? Could you manage it? I wanted to ask him to-night; but of course I couldn't—without your knowing beforehand."

"Mercy, no, Burke!" shuddered the young housekeeper. "Don't you dare—when I don't know it."

"But if you do know it—"

"Why, y-yes, I guess so. Of course I could get things I was sure of, like potato salad and——"

Burke sat back in his chair.

"But, Helen, I'm afraid—I don't think—that is, I'm 'most sure Gleason doesn't like potato salad," he stammered.

"Doesn't he? Well, he needn't eat it, then. We'll have all the more left for the next day."

"But, Helen, er——"

"Oh, I'll have chips, too; don't worry, dear. I'll give him something to eat," she promised gayly. "Do you suppose I'm going to have one of your swell friends come here, and then have you ashamed of me? You just wait and see!"

"Er, no—no, indeed, of course not," plunged in her husband feverishly, trying to ward off a repetition of the "swell"—a word he particularly abhorred.

Several times in the last two months he had heard Helen use this word—twice when she had informed him with great glee that some swell friends of his from Elm Hill had come in their carriage to call; and again quite often when together on the street they met some one whom he knew. He thought he hated the word a little more bitterly every time he heard it.

Merry Moments

TORTURE. Soft and clammy, it brushed against his face. Instinctively he raised his arm and dodged sideways to escape it, but was seized in a vise-like grip. His courage failed him utterly. He gave vent to a piercing scream, but the only answer was the echo from the four walls of the room. Twice he endeavored to break away. His effort was useless. The moist, warm thing that first had but touched his face forced its way against his nostrils and over his mouth. His breathing became labored. Into his eyes and ears this oozy presence groped its way. He wondered why he, of all the world, should be subjected to this torture. His spirit was broken—he whimpered like some cowed animal. And then——

"I don't see why a boy of nine can act so babyish when he is having his face washed," exclaimed his mother.

NO REST FOR THE IDLE. Little Jim's father was an exceedingly idle man and when in an attempt to inform his son about Sunday he remarked: "Sunday is a day for all men to rest."

Jim's big eyes flew wider open as he inquired, "But, papa, is all your days Sundays?"

ALL THE COMFORTS OF HOME. Before the lesson at the mission study class the other night, the station agent remarked that two elephants had gone over the Wabash that day, and that the car that carried them had two hot boxes.

Now the boys in the class understood right away that the car axles had been insufficiently oiled and the grease in the boxes had caught fire; but one of the girls———

"Why, who'd ever thought that they'd put in foot-warmers for those poor elephants!"

HE WAS FAR-SIGHTED. An ambitious colored man had quit his job and was being granted a new one with another concern, when his employer asked him if he could be ready to commence work in two weeks. He replied:

"I fear dat would be difficult for me to be ready in two weeks, but I could be ready in one week shore."

"How's that?" asked his employer.

"Well, in one week I can finish de garden work," was his answer, "but, if I is home then one week more, de missus would be rushin' me into de middle of house-cleanin'."

ANATOMY AND FRIENDSHIP. "My dear," said the host to his wife as he started to carve the leg of lamb, "can't you give Mrs. Brown anything better than this cold meat?" "Oh," cried Mrs. Brown, "that's all right, so long as it is cold leg and not cold shoulder."

IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN. A party of tourists were examining the curios in a little shop on a back street in a certain European city. The aged dealer, desirous of making a sale, picked up an ancient-looking sword and said:

"You see, my friends, this most wonderful sword: this is the sword that Balaam killed the ass with."

"But," said one. "Balaam didn't kill the ass; he only wished for a sword that he might kill her."

"Well," said the dealer, "this is the one he wished for."

AN ANCIENT CALF. Awkward mistakes occur sometimes through falling into certain mannerisms of expression. A parson had a habit of frequently saying "for years, and years, and years" in the course of a sermon. He was preaching on the prodigal son, and spoke of him sitting down in that far-off land thinking of the home that he had not seen "for years and years and years." This was all right, but presently he spoke of the welcome to his old home, and of the calf which his father had kept in anticipation of that happy day. "Yes," said he, dropping into his favorite cadence for the winding up of a sentence, "Yes, the calf which he had kept for years, and years, and years." Then somebody laughed. —Tit-Bits.

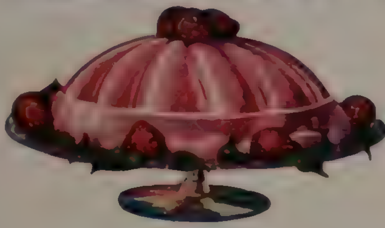
Jiffy-Jell

The Supreme Dessert

Fruit Juice Flavors-In Sealed Vials

Try This New Creation

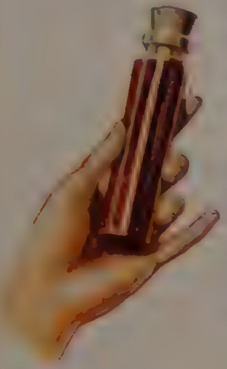
Which Millions Have Adopted



Do you know that Jiffy-Jell is the greatest success ever known in quick, fruity desserts?

It is a new creation, unknown a year ago. Now it has millions of users. And to each it has brought a new delight which they never will miss again.

Mr. Otis E. Glidden, the famous gelatine expert, is the man behind Jiffy-Jell. He has studied these desserts for 17 years, in Europe and America. And now he has created the supreme dessert, twice better than the best kind that you know.



Each Flavor in a Vial

The Only Dessert

Jiffy-Jell is the only quick dessert made with Waukesha gelatine. That is a very rare grade, of which little is made. And it costs twice as much as the common.

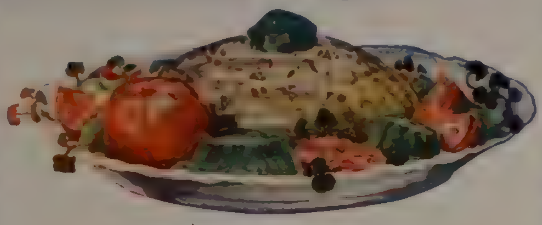
The men who make it have joined with Mr. Glidden. And they have built—for Jiffy-Jell only—the model food plant of America.

Fruit-Made Flavors Sealed in Vials

Jiffy-Jell is also the only quick dessert which has fruit-made flavors in vials.

Each flavor is made from the fruit itself. None is synthetic, none is adulterated. Each is concentrated fruit juice.

To keep its natural zest and savor, each flavor comes sealed in a vial. It cannot deteriorate.



Lime Jiffy-Jell—Green and Tart As a Garnish for Meats, Etc.

And you do not scald it with the boiling water you use on the Jiffy-Jell powder. You add the flavor from the vial when the jell has partly cooled.

So Jiffy-Jell desserts all come to your table with the flavor of fresh, ripe fruit. They need no additions. They taste as though made with freshly-picked fruits, right at the picking time.

You will be amazed at these fascinating products. They are made in a jiffy. Add no sweetening, no color—simply boiling water. They will change your whole conception of gelatine desserts.

GLAD DAWNS

By Remington Schuyler

At dawn I plow the mountain peaks,
And sing of victory;
Beneath me lies the sleeping world,
Adrowse in lethargy.

Below me in the valley's depths
The trembling mists now flee;
While, high above, the morning star
Thrills with expectancy.

Far off across the mighty hills
I see the day arise
And fling it's glowing banners wide
Across the waking skies.

I shout at daybreak on the peaks
My song of victory!
For now beneath me wakes a world
Aglow with energy.

In this historic picture are grouped leaders of all the factions who were united under Madero after the fall of Diaz. First row, left to right, are as follows: Manuel Bonillas, later ambassador to the United States; Alberto Madero; Dr. Vasquez Gomez, president of Mexico for a few days; Francisco Madero, the murdered president; second from him Venustiano Carranza, now president; next, Vino Suarez, later vice-president. Back of Bonillas, the man with a full beard, Roque Gonzales Garza, president for three months; standing back of President Madero, with his hand on Gomez's chair, is Pascual Orozco; next to him, wearing a straw hat, Emilio Madero; and next to him, in the light coat and black hat, Giuseppe Garibaldi. Behind Suarez, with his hand on the back of a chair, Raoul Madero; and Pancho Villa stands at the back under the Bell telephone sign, only his big sombrero showing.

VILLA AS I KNEW HIM

By

EDWARD S. O'REILLY

[Edward S. O'Reilly served with honor and distinction in the United States Army during the Spanish-American War. His experiences inspired Rex Beach's notable story, "Rainbow's End," in which the novelist named his hero "The O'Reilly." The soldier-author has written many wonderful tales, but none more full of human interest than that which appears in this issue of the Christian Herald. It is a strong, virile portraiture of Pancho Villa, the bandit chief who has been and is today a strange, inexplicable, dominating figure in Mexican affairs. For the first time American readers have here a vivid portraiture of this semi-barbarous leader by one who knows him and his untamable ways better perhaps than any other American.]

PANCHO VILLA, as much a Man of Destiny as Napoleon, recently graduated from a hunted fugitive to the command of an army of 40,000 men, was seated on the velvet cushions of his private car holding his daily court. Grouped about him were members of his famous bodyguard, cronies of his bandit days, newspapermen, a special agent of the United States government, a Yankee drummer with a carload of cheap shoes to sell, and the generals of his staff.

He had that day arrived at Aguascalientes, and trainload after trainload of his soldiers were bumping down the main track, southward bound for the campaign against Carranza. He was talking of President Wilson, for whom, at that time, he professed a great admiration.

"Tell me," he asked in the "pelado" (Spanish-Indian) dialect which is his only language, "how is it that President Wilson can understand the sorrows of the people when he has never even been in jail?"

His queries were interrupted by an officer of his staff, saluting timidly from the car door. Behind the officer stood two frightened soldiers, their hands bound behind their backs.

"Mi general," reported the officer, "here are the two men who broke into the milk-seller's casa and attacked his daughter."

Villa sat silent a moment, crouched in his seat. As he gazed at the trembling prisoners, his expression changed from smiling good-nature to savage ferocity. His eyes opened wide and seemed literally about to pop from his head.

Jumping to his feet with a characteristic cat-like quickness, he drew his pistol and for a second seemed intent on killing the accused men in the doorway. Suddenly thrusting the pistol back into its holster, he leaped forward and struck one of the soldiers a blow with his open hand.

"You dogs! You wear the uniform of the Army of Liberty and you make war on the helpless people! You are no better than the soldiers of the Federales. Take them out and give them a volley."

Hastily the officer hustled the prisoners down the car steps. Villa stood for a moment as if drunk with fury, shouting profanity hysterically at the offending soldiers; then, turning back to his seat, his face was again transformed by the good-natured smile.

"Tell me more about your president. I like him very much. Is it true that he has never had a fight? How can a man lead men if he has never won fights?"

Even as he talked we heard a volley from the nearby roundhouse, and glancing out of the window could see the two soldiers fall dead before the rifles of the firing squad. General Villa never wavered an instant in his conversation, asking question after question.

The incident gave a picture of General Francisco Villa; his endless questioning, his championship of the peons, his ruthless brutality to all who opposed him.

Three years before I had first met Pancho Villa, when he rode into the camp of Francisco I. Madero at the head of his picturesque troop of bandits and cowboys. A few weeks after the incident above recorded I saw him ride into Mexico City at the head of an army of 45,000 soldiers, master of Mexico.

This article is not a defense or an attack on Villa. It is a personal story of the man, told by one who accompanied him on several of his campaigns. American people make the error of judging Villa by American standards. He is the last of the great Indian chieftains. His ideals are the semi-barbarous ideals of the Indian. All his life he has been fighting against oppression, which in Mexico meant fighting against the law.

Whatever we may think of the character of the man, it must be conceded that he is the idol of the peon class, the "pelados," and the pelado is armed and in the saddle for the first time in his history. As long as Villa lives, with the recently born hatred of the, "gringo" in his heart, he will be a menace to the peace of our country.

By the sheer force of his personality he rose in a few years from a mountain outlaw with a price on his head to the conqueror of Mexico. For a time he was the favorite of our administration. The ports he controlled were kept open for the importation of munitions of war. A special representative of the United States government traveled constantly with him, and a swarm of flattering concession-seekers flocked around him. Now he is again the proscribed outlaw, and he blames his downfall on the United States.

For six years he has been the most spectacular figure in the public eye. Swashbuckling into the daily news at the beginning of the Madero rebellion against Diaz in 1911, he has held the center of the stage in the popular imagination.

We see him leading his ragged followers to victory against trained soldiers. Again, he is arrested by General Huerta, stood before a firing squad and condemned to death. Saved by a seeming miracle, he is imprisoned in Mexico City. Escaping from prison, he becomes a fugitive along the American border. Crossing the Rio Grande with nine followers, he organized an army of peons and crushed Huerta, the dictator. His career would supply material for a hundred lurid romances.

General Villa had promised to give me the story of his life for publication. Frequently we started the task, but his talk would be the same old tirade against the cruelty of the landowners and very little about himself. However, I succeeded in gathering a few stories of his early life. One will illustrate the cause of his popularity with the peons.

Squatting on his heels by the campfire, a gaudy Indian blanket draped around his shoulders, he was engaged in his favorite recreation, profanely abusing

General Luis Terrazas, former governor of Chihuahua, and Villa's most hated enemy.

"Did I tell you, Tejano [Texan], of the time I got the silver of the old gray fox, and the joke I played on myself?"

Gesticulating, scowling and laughing by turns, his voice pitched in the high falsetto which was his usual tone when excited, he told the tale. His sentences were short and jerky.

"My friends of the ranchitos had told me about the silver. It was going to one of the Terrazas haciendas. That's why I waited in the hills. The driver of the wagon shot at me, but I got the silver. It was about 6,000 pesos, too heavy for my horse.

"That night I must ride many leagues. There were many who would make dried meat of Pancho Villa. So I hid half of the pesos under a rock.

"Then I saw another wagon coming. There were two women and a driver. I said, 'These people are poor. Like all in Chihuahua, they, too, have suffered from this villain of a governor I have taxed. Perhaps I may never see the silver I have hidden under the rock. So I will give it to these poor people. It may make many families happy, and feed the little muchachos.'

"So I ran my horse in front of the coach. And I told them this that I have said. Then I gave them the pesos. I said, 'Use this to get out of the clutches of old Terrazas.' They thanked me, but they were very much afraid, because I was Pancho Villa. Then I rode to the Sierras."

"Do you know, Tejano, what I found days after? I had given the silver to a daughter of Terrazas! My friends laughed at me for a fool."

Many of these stories of Villa's liberality to the peons are true. He robbed from the rich and gave to the poor. This has been the custom of many of the great leaders of revolutions.

It was in the early days of the Madero revolution, January, 1911, that Villa first rode into the headlines of Mexican history. He had gathered several hundred mountaineers and vaqueros and offered his services to Madero. Always impatient of restraint, he had operated alone, moving like a phantom about the state of Chihuahua, attacking small garrisons of federals and raiding ranches.

It was after the capture of Juarez, opposite El Paso, Texas, by the Maderista forces, that I first met him. We were introduced by General Toribio Ortega, afterward one of his most trusted generals. The ex-bandit leader was an eye-filling picture. He wore the immense gold-braided sombrero of the Mexican vaquero, tight-fitting leather leggins, two revolvers and cross-belts of rifle cartridges.

After the victory at Juarez, Villa proved that it was impossible for him to take orders. He quarreled with General Orozco because Orozco had been given superior rank. Colonel Giuseppe Garibaldi, grandson of the Italian liberator, who recently laid down his life in the trenches in France, also aroused his enmity.

During the battle Villa had sworn that he would kill General Navarro, the federal commander, with his own pistol. President Madero liberated Navarro after the surrender and sent him to safety on the American side of the Rio Grande. Villa flew into one of his unreasoning passions and vowed vengeance on Garibaldi, who had personally accepted General Navarro's surrender. In his blind rage Villa followed Garibaldi over the river to El Paso, vowing to kill him on sight. He found the young Italian standing unarmed in the lobby of the Hotel Sheldon. Walking catlike with hand opened stiffly by his pistol holster, Villa advanced toward his intended victim.

At that moment a little blue-eyed American stepped before him and held up his hand. It was Mayor Kelly of El Paso, a noted border character.

"Villa, you're in the wrong town. Give me your pistol."

"No man but myself has ever touched that pistol," shouted Villa.

"Get back through that door," calmly answered Mayor Kelly, pointing toward the entrance to a haberdasher's shop which opened into the lobby. "There are women and children here."

Villa stepped backward into the shop.

"Give me that gun and get out of town. Do you think you can raid El Paso?" quietly demanded the mayor.

Villa glared about him. He saw several big-hatted Texas cowboys posed in the doorway. Seeming to realize that his foot was off his native desert, he handed his gun to the valiant little official, strode from the shop and, jumping into a carriage, drove back to Juarez.

A few days later we entered the state capital, Chihuahua. President Diaz had fled the country. Madero was on his triumphal journey to Mexico City. Abram Gonzales had been appointed provisional governor of Chihuahua and had commissioned me a captain on his staff. It was during the peace celebration that I again saw Villa. No longer the leather-clad cowboy, he was dressed in American clothes, carefully barbered and pomaded, his Mongolian mustache close clipped.

One of his sweethearts, Luz Corral, had befriended him in one of his numerous escapades. He had come to lead her to the altar in the ancient cathedral.

Sixteen years before Villa had fled from Chihuahua a hunted outlaw. Now a throng of high officials gathered in the cathedral and attended his wedding feast.

He was a bandit no more. Pardoned by Madero for his offense against the law, Villa was now a colonel in the army, a man of position. Also he had been rewarded for his work in the rebellion by a gift of the "rastro," or slaughter-house concession, in Chihuahua.

This period of peace was short-lived. Madero had hardly taken his seat as the elected president of Mexico when a counter-insurrection was started. Emilio Campa and Inez Salazar led a revolt in western Chihuahua and marched on the state capital. General Orozco, the state commander, deserted Madero and joined the new movement.

Villa fled from Chihuahua back to his native mountains and in a few weeks was again at the head of a band of his old-time followers. Then followed the campaign against the Orozco forces, or, "red flaggers," as they were called.

President Madero appointed General Salas to command the army moving from Torreon to recapture Chihuahua. Salas was defeated at the battle of Rellano, and committed suicide that night.

Edward S. (Tex.) O'Reilly

In this battle the insurrectos used a spectacular trick to block the federal troop trains. An old switch engine was made into a flying land torpedo. Boxes of dynamite were piled on the cowcatcher. The lever of the whistle was tied down and, screaming like a maddened animal, the wild engine was started on the down grade toward the advancing troop trains. There was a collision, a terrific explosion; scores of soldiers were killed and the railroad was blocked by the wreckage.

To succeed General Salas, President Madero selected an old retired general who had not been in active service for several years. Some malignant fate seemed to prompt the choice, for the man placed at the head of the armies was General Victoriano Huerta, who was afterward to turn on his benefactor and make himself dictator of Mexico.

Pancho Villa at this time was following his usual tactics. He was constantly on the move, striking the rebels again and again and escaping when the odds were against him. Finally he circled the right wing of Orozco's army and captured Parral, an important mining town.

Generals Campa and Salazar at once moved to recapture the town. Although hopelessly outnumbered, Villa defended the place for three days and then escaped with his band.

It was at this fight that my friend Tom Fountain, of New Mexico, was murdered. Tom had been fighting with Villa, operating a machine gun. He tarried too long in the retreat and was captured by the Orozco forces. The next morning Tom was taken from the adobe house where he was imprisoned and led into the street. An officer handed him a silver dollar, saying:

"See that Chino restaurant down the street? Go buy your breakfast and return."

Tom walked down the street toward the restaurant. A dozen grinning officers were lined up on the sidewalks. At a signal they drew their revolvers and began shooting. Poor Tom Fountain, an unarmed prisoner of war in uniform, was shot down like a rabbit, to give sport to a group of drink-crazed Mexican officers. This is common custom among the Mexicans. It is known as the "ley de fuga," or fugitive law.

Pancho Villa was a thorn in the side of General Huerta. The ex-bandit was hated by the officers of the old Diaz army, because he had killed several of their companions in private war. Also Villa was ignoring Huerta's commands and conducting his campaign according to his own ideas. Finally Villa condescended to report to Huerta's headquarters at Jiménez. It came near costing him his life.

Huerta immediately put Villa under arrest and condemned him to death. Although there was no trial, a list of charges was made public. Villa was accused of looting the stores of Parral, of robbing non-combatants and refusing to obey the orders of his superior officers. Many of these charges were probably true, as Villa was ever a law unto himself.

As it happened, I was in Jiménez at the time, although I did not actually witness the attempted execution of Villa. According to eye-witnesses, Villa had confronted General Huerta and dènounced him. It was a dramatic meeting between the old army officer, who was soon to seize the government and set himself up as dictator, and the unlettered cowboy who was to break the backbone of his power and drive him into exile.

After the interview Villa was marched to a nearby adobe corral by a firing squad. Villa took his stand against the adobe wall and the soldiers of the squad loaded their rifles. The boy lieutenant in charge drew his sword and was about to give the command to fire which would have ended the career of Pancho Villa and changed the history of Mexico.

At that moment Villa took a step forward, saluted the lieutenant and said:

"Two minutes will not make much difference. May I speak to General Emilio Madero? I saw him just outside the corral."

The lieutenant hesitated a moment, then ordered his soldiers to lower their rifles and granted the request. Emilio Madero was summoned, and to him Villa made an appeal for his life.

The Maderos were always friendly to Villa. The ex-bandit's love of President Francisco Madero was one of the moving motives of his life. Emilio Madero ordered the officer of the firing squad to delay the execution fifteen minutes. Calling his friend, General Trucy Aubert, the two hurried to Huerta's office and argued against the killing of Villa.

Finally Huerta grudgingly consented, and ordered Villa sent to Belen Prison in Mexico City, a prisoner in irons. Later, when Villa was sweeping the armies of Huerta like stampeded cattle before him, the old general made the remark:

"The greatest mistake a soldier can make is to show mercy to his enemies."

For months Villa suffered the torments of Belen, one of the worst infernos of punishment in the world. It was during his imprisonment that he learned to write his name, laboriously practicing it letter by letter on the walls of his cell.

Orozco was defeated, and his forces scattered like quail in the mountains of Chihuahua and Sonora. Huerta returned to Mexico City and was placed at the head of Madero's armies, as a reward for his success.

Villa had many friends among the government officials at the national capital. They remembered his efficient work for the revolution. His escape was arranged, and he was smuggled out of Mexico in the garments of a laborer to Havana, Cuba. From there his passage was paid to Galveston, Texas, and then to El Paso.

These were dark days for the former war chief. An exile from his native mountains, penniless, he was forced to live on the charity of poor laborers who befriended him. The city police discovered that he was in the city and warned him that he would be arrested if he appeared on the streets. By day he would hide in a dark room back of a little shop in the Mexican quarter. At night he would take long walks along the country roads of the valley.

Then came the Decina Trajica in Mexico City. Felix Diaz, a nephew of the old dictator, aided by General Bernardo Reyes, escaped from prison and led a revolt in the streets against President Madero. Madero put his faith in General Huerta. After desperate fighting in the streets of the capital, Huerta betrayed his benefactor and joined forces with the insurgents. Madero was murdered, and public announcement was made that he had resigned before his death. Felix Diaz, the leader of the revolt, was ignored, and the army proclaimed Huerta provisional president.

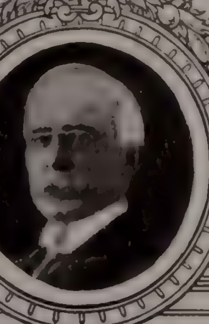
NOT SEVEN TIMES



A SERMON

By

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Matt. 18:21, 22. "How oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times? I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven."

"HOW oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?"

What a beautifully simple rule that would have been! Forgive seven times! How easily the rule could have been applied! The merest tyro could have measured out his moral obligations to a nicety. Forgiveness would have been a matter of careful counting - four times, five times, six times, seven times, and then——! How this little rule would have simplified our moral relationships! How it would have revealed the whole extent of our responsibilities, and shown us just where we were! "How oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?" . . . "I say not unto thee, until seven times; but until seventy times seven." Then the Master will not accept and confirm the simple rule. He rejects it. Not seven times, but seventy times seven!

Forgiveness is not a thing which begins when I have counted one, and may end when I have counted seven. It has no arithmetical boundaries. It reaches away where simple arithmetic wearies itself and is lost. "Till seven times!" That is a simple rule. "Seventy times seven!" That is a great principle. A rule has limits; it begins here, it ends there. A principle is like God's overhanging firmament; its boundaries are horizon lines; but when you go to touch them, and say, "Here the firmament ends," they recede before you—things that can never be grasped. Forgiveness is not a thing to be settled by petty rules, and so no petty rule was given. Instead of a rule, he gave us a principle—"Not seven times, but seventy times seven."

Now little children are governed by rules. In the government of childhood everything has to be strictly and minutely measured. Precise instructions have to be given. It is not enough to say to a child, "Be just." You have to be more explicit. You have to break up the meat into small pieces. You have to go into little details. You have to dissolve great principles into tiny rules. It is so with the whole round of a child's life. It is governed by rules. But when childhood is left behind you get away from the minute guidance of rules into the freer guidance of principles.

IT is even so with peoples and with races. A race in its infancy and childhood is governed by minutely expressed rules. Take the history of the Jews as we find it in this book. Turn to the pages which tell the story of its infancy, and you will find a multitude of minute and simple rules. Every little duty was measured out with most scrupulous nicety. Every department of life was mapped out by strict and punctilious regulations. Take the matter of eating. Mark the details of the instructions. "These are the beasts which ye shall eat; the ox, the sheep and the goat, the hart and the roebuck, and the fallow deer and the wild goat, and every beast that parteth the hoof and cleaveth the cleft in two claws, and cheweth the cud among the beasts, that ye shall eat; nevertheless ye shall not eat of the camel and the hare, for they chew the cud but divide not the hoof," and so on. See how sharp and minute the regulations! It is legislation for a race in its infancy. Look how it deals with the matter of personal injury. Somebody has injured you; what retaliation can you make? Here is the instruction: "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a foot for a foot." How simple it all is! Everything is so precisely and accurately measured for us that we know just where we are and the extent of our freedom. But it is legislation for babes! It is a vast system of rules for a people in its childhood.

These rules were lamps for men's feet in the dim, early twilight of the world. But you know how, when the sun rises, the lamplighter goes his round, and puts out the little lamps that have done duty for us in the night, but which are no longer needed in the broader day! And as I turn the pages of this history, and mark the broadening light, to the time when "the glory of the Lord" is risen upon us, I see the lamplighter going his rounds, and putting out one after another of the legislative lamps which had done duty in an earlier and a darker day.

BUT men have a strange fondness for simple rules. If you turn to the story of our Saviour's life you will find what a strong partiality the Jewish people had for the rules of their childhood. They dearly loved a rule that was clear and manageable. For instance, they were very fond of this little rule: "Thou shalt take a tithe of mint and anise and cummin and present it to the priest." That was so plain and easy! A child could discharge it. And they wanted all their morality and all their religion to be reduced to a matter of simple arithmetic. So they tried in a hundred ways to constrain our Master to put the Gospel of the kingdom into a dozen simple rules. One came to him and said: "Who is my neighbor?" And he hoped that the Lord would draw a little circle and say, "All in there." It would have been so beautifully simple to have been told that all your neighbors lived in a given area, and belonged to a given race, and that outside those limits all the obligations of neighborliness ceased!

But Christ gave no such rule. He told the story of the Good Samaritan, a story which makes neighborliness not a thing which begins at this mile-post and ends at another, not a thing confined within geographical or racial boundaries, but a thing illimitable as human need. He gave not a rule but a principle. And here comes Simon Peter, bothered with this matter of forgiveness, and wanting it all to be put into a little rule, that he might know the beginning and the end of it. "Lord, now oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?" He is back in the childhood of the race. He wants his religion to be a vast system of petty rules. "How oft? Seven times?" The Master told him it could not be expressed arithmetically; it was a finer and subtler thing. "I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven." Yea, to a number where the scaling power of arithmetic retires with wearied wing.

Christianity is not built upon arithmetic; it is built upon a cross. We do not count our way into glory. Christianity gives no precise and minute instructions. It does not guide us by little lamps placed at every step of the way. It guides us by great stars. I make a huge mistake if I go to the New Testament for a rule. I go wisely if I go for a principle. Ever and always it answers my request for a rule in the words of the Master: "Not seven times, but seventy times seven!"

TAKE the matter of Christian giving. As a Christian man, how much of my income ought I to give away? Peter went to Christ and asked, "How oft should I forgive?" I go to Christ and ask, "How much ought I to give?" It appears as though some little arithmetical rule would here be welcome. Would it not have greatly simplified matters if the New Testament had expressed itself on this subject with absolute precision? Supposing the New Testament had given commandments such as these: He who has an income of $250 must give so much; he who has an income of $500 must give so much; he who has an income of $5,000 must give so much—how clear would then have been the requirement! Or even if Christianity had said, "Thou shalt give a tenth of thine income," how simple and comprehensible would have been the rule! But Christianity gives no such rule. It will no more name a figure about giving than it will name a figure about forgiving.

You see the nature of the government which lies behind all this. It is a government based on parental confidence. It is a Father trusting his own children to make sound, generous moral decisions. Our Father has so much confidence in us that he makes no hard, arbitrary rule for Christian giving, but leaves it to the filial love and loyalty of his children to determine how much of their possessions they will offer to relieve the pains and sorrows of the world. Do we abuse the confidence? Would it have been better for the world if Christianity had just reaffirmed the rule laid down in the world's babyhood, and made it compulsory for every man to give one-tenth? Is the world poorer under the Father's generous confidence than it was when charity was governed by arbitrary law? Brethren, have you thought of that? God has left it to you to give as he hath prospered you. Are you acting honorably with him, or is his confidence betrayed? We cannot state a rule, but we can emphasize a principle: "As God hath prospered thee." Does that regulate your giving?

Brethren, I fear that on this matter there is an awful amount of black disloyalty. Think of it. There are Christian people who spend as much money on going to an opera for one night as they give in twelve months to the evangelization of the world. Is that dealing fairly with God? There are men in Christian churches who at one dinner drink as much money in champagne as they give in one year to the work of the foreign field. Is that dealing honorably with God? Is that loyal to a Father who has reposed in us his confidence? We cannot point to a rule and say: There is the law: that is how much you ought to give; but we can affirm and reaffirm the Christian principle—"As God hath prospered thee." Take that principle into your life, and you will make your own rules. Be loyal to the God who is loyal to you. Show him that you are worthy of his confidence when he treats you as being more than a child. Be the man God assumes you to be when he seeks to govern you by large principles and not by arbitrary rules. "Not seven times, but seventy times seven."

PRESIDENT DEFINES TREASON. The President on April 16 issued a proclamation calling the attention of aliens and citizens to the acts which this country holds treasonable and warning them that the laws for the punishment of treason would be vigorously prosecuted. He quoted Section 3 of Article 3 in the Constitution, which provides in part that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." The penalty for treason under the criminal code is death or, at the discretion of the court, imprisonment for not less than five years, and a fine of not less than $10,000. Persons knowing of treasonable actions and withholding the information may be imprisoned for seven years or fined $1,000. Conspiracy to overthrow the government, to oppose its authority, to prevent, hinder or delay the execution of any law, or to seize any property of the United States, may carry a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for six years, or both. The performance of any act or the publication of statements or information which will give aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States is treasonable, as is the acquisition, use or disposal of any property with knowledge or intent that it is to be of assistance to the enemy in their hostilities against the United States.

VOLUNTEERS OR DRAFT. During the last week the military committees of both houses of Congress held under consideration the army General Staff Bill by which it was proposed to create an army. Conferences were frequent between the members of the two committees, the President and Secretary Baker, the Administration leaders being reported firm in their advocacy of the selective draft principle. On April 18, both committees reported to their respective houses. The House Military Committee reported, by a vote of 13 to 8. a bill which authorized the President to use the volunteer system to secure men for the army, and gave the President power to use the selective draft in case he became convinced that the volunteer system would not provide the men. A previous informal ballot had shown the committee 9 to 8 against the draft principle. The Senate Committee reported by a vote of 10 to 7 the Administration bill, without modifying materially the provision for the draft. It was announced that the Administration would still fight for the original bill, and that it was possible that the bill might be passed first in the Senate, it being felt that the favorable action of the Senate would influence like action in the House. The bill as reported to the House altered the eligible military age from 19 to 25 years, as provided by the General Staff Bill, to 21 to 40 years. Both the Senate and House bills contemplated the raising of an army of 1,000,000 men.

CENSORING THE CENSORSHIP. The Espionage Bill, drafted by Attorney General Gregory to regulate the publication of news regarding the national defense, was under discussion in the Senate on April 18. Many senators attacked the bill as an unconstitutional attempt to limit the freedom of the press, and as being so drawn as to penalize honest criticism of public officers and to give such officers undue power over possible critics.

BOND ISSUE AUTHORIZED. The bill authorizing the $7,000,000,000 bond issue passed the Senate on April 17 by a vote of 84 to 0.

RECRUITING FOR THE ALLIES. The Senate and House on April 18 passed an Administration bill which permits the allies of the United States to recruit their subjects in this country under regulations proscribed by the Secretary of War.

COLOMBIAN TREATY DROPPED. The Colombian treaty, including the provision to pay $25,000,000 to that country, was dropped from the Senate calendar on April 18. A new convention is being negotiated, which it is understood will contain new concessions of military value to the United States, and will provide that in case of war Colombia will become an ally of the United States or remain neutral.

FIRST NAVAL ACTION. Early on the morning of April 17 the deck watch of the United States destroyer Smith, patrolling somewhere off New York Harbor, sighted the periscope of a submarine about 300 yards from the ship and saw the wake of a torpedo which crossed the bow of the destroyer. The presence of the submarine was immediately reported by wireless, and appropriate steps were taken by the patrol fleet. Naval officers in Washington expressed the opinion that several submarines had been sent to American waters, possibly in an attempt to account for the vessels carrying the British and French war commissioners.

NEW MEXICAN AMBASSADOR. Ignacio Bonillas, newly accredited ambassador from Mexico to the United States, was formally presented to President Wilson on April 17. He assured President Wilson of the sincere desire of Carranza for the prosperity of the people of the United States, and assured him also that constitutional order would be restored in Mexico by May 1. President Carranza, addressing the new Mexican congress on April 15, declared that Mexico would maintain a strict and rigorous neutrality.

LATIN AMERICA AND THE WAR. Reports from South American countries show that all of the Latin-American nations but Ecuador, Venezuela, Colombia and the Central American countries have declared neutrality as between the United States and Germany, or have declared themselves in sympathy with the stand of the United States. Cuba and Panama have declared war against Germany. Brazil and Bolivia have broken relations with Germany but at this writing had gone no further, although anti-German riots were reported from Brazil. Costa Rica had offered her ports to the United States for the use of the American navy; Uruguay, Paraguay and Argentina had endorsed the action of the United States. Guatemala had proclaimed martial law, and it was believed that Honduras, Salvador and Nicaragua were awaiting the action of Guatemala. Forty-six German vessels were seized by the Brazilian government, thirty-three of which were larger than 4,000 tons. Public opinion in Argentina was aroused on April 17 by the torpedoing without warning of the Argentine sailing vessel Monte Protegido. The A B C governments were reported to be negotiating with a view to convening in Buenos Aires an assembly of the South American republics to establish if possible a continental entente concerning the problems arising from the war.

WHITLOCK IN PARIS. Brand Whitlock, United States minister to Belgium, Mrs. Whitlock, and the legation staff reached Paris on April 16 on their way to Havre.

RECRUITING. During the week of April 15, army and navy recruiting stations reported a steady increase in the number of men accepted. The navy announced that it desired to increase its force to 100,000 as rapidly as possible. In the Eastern cities various committees appointed by mayors and other public officers engaged in publicity work in the interests of recruiting, the Mayor's Committee in New York giving special attention to the needs of the Marine Corps, those soldiers of the sea who have so many times been the first to carry the flag into action. April 19 was Lexington Day and was observed as a special recruiting day throughout many of the states, special parades being arranged, church bells being rung, posters being displayed and automobiles carrying speakers being placed at the meeting-points of the crowds in the various cities. The Merchants' Association of New York announced on April 18 that it planned to lay before the Secretary of War a plan under which every man applying for enlistment in the army and navy be accepted, and that those not found physically fit be sent to the farms to raise crops as a setting-up exercise. Men rejected by recruiting stations are being given letters and lapel buttons to distinguish them from "slackers."

THE NEW TAXES. It being planned to raise $2,000,000,000 by taxation to redeem the short-term certificates of indebtedness authorized as a part of the $7,000,000,000 bond issue, Secretary McAdoo on April 15 pointed out these sources from which the tax might be drawn: reduction of the income tax exemption from $3,000 to $1,500 for unmarried persons, and from $4,000 to $2,000 for married persons, leaving the normal tax at 2 per cent. and raising the supertaxes, will produce $340,000,000 in addition to the present returns; an excess-profits tax will raise about $200,000,000; taxes on imports now free of duty will produce $206,000,000; taxes on freight transportation receipts, $100,000,000; an excise tax on sugar, $92,000,000; refined petroleum, $75,000,000; stamp taxes on theater,

President Appoints Official Censor. President Wilson on April 14 created by executive order a Committee on Public Information and appointed George Creel, a magazine writer, as executive chairman of the committee, the other members of the committee being the Secretaries of State, War and Navy. All information regarding the activities of these departments will pass through this new bureau, and no facts relating to these departments are expected to be published without the sanction of the bureau.

Parliament Prolonged. The British House of Commons on April 17 passed a bill extending the life of the present Parliament from April 30 until November. The bill was opposed by the Nationalists.

Barred Zones Guard Harbors. Defensive war zones around the coast of the United States were announced in an executive order issued by President Wilson on April 5, made public on April 13. The barred zones extend for a distance of from two to ten miles from all American harbors. The proclamation established certain rules and regulations for the passage of vessels into, out of and through these zones, no vessel other than public vessels of the United States being permitted in the zones between sunset and sunrise.

Fifty Millions for Ships. The United States Shipping Board on April 15 incorporated itself for $50,000,000 as a ship-building concern. It was expected that the Board would immediately take over certain shipyards, and that other shipyards would be helped financially, the whole enterprise being under the direction of Major General Goethals.

Fragments of News. Secretary Daniels, with the President's approval, has declined to accept or approve offers of rewards to officers or enlisted men of the United States navy for the destruction of German submarines, stating: "The officers and enlisted men of the American navy need no money stimulus to do their duty and jeopardize their lives in the service of their country." . . .Because of the enormous addition to the clerical forces in the various departments at Washington, typewriter manufacturers are said to be overwhelmed with government orders, which are being given right of way over all other business. . . . Mayor Mitchel of New York announced on April 17 that after May 1 and until the war ends, all-night licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquor would be canceled. No liquor will be sold in the metropolis after one A. M. . . . Soft-coal miners in conference with the representatives of operators came to an agreement on April 17 by which the men received a twenty per cent. increase in wages. The increase will affect 225,000 workers. . . .George Bakhmeteff, Russian ambassador to the United States since 1911, cabled his resignation to the provisional government on April 17. It was rumored that his successor might be Baron Rosen, who was his predecessor. . . .The Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates in congress at Petrograd on April 17 passed resolutions favoring the suppression of classes and titles and the confiscation of all lands belonging to the crown, church and monasteries, the lands to be transferred to the use of the peasants. . . . The United States gunboat Scorpion, stationed at Constantinople, was interned by the Turkish government. Foreseeing this action, the majority of the crew had been sent home by way of Switzerland before the break in relations between the United States and Germany. . . . On April 16 a conference was held between Secretary of Agriculture Houston and representatives of the meat-packers. The conference discussed laws being framed to fix food prices. The packers suggested the licensing of food-distributing agencies so that the government may trace any movements to monopolize the supply or force rises in prices. The packers offered a plan to distribute their products at a minimum profit to themselves, a plan which it was estimated would save the public at least $100,000,000 a year. . . . According to dispatches from Christiania under date of April 18, there was a strong movement in Norway toward the arming of Norwegian merchant ships. According to the report, one-third of Norway's merchant fleet had been sunk, the loss being 420 ships of 650,000 tons. Four hundred and fifty sailors had been killed in these sinkings. . . . The Spanish steamship Tom, 2,409 tons, was reported on April 18 as torpedoed without warning. . . . Argentina on April 20 demanded from Germany satisfaction for the sinking of the ship Monte Protegido. . . . . Germany will not intern Americans, but will treat them the same as Germans are to be treated in the United States. . . . Turkey severed diplomatic relations with the United States on April 20. The Progress of the War

THE principal fighting of the past week has taken place on the western front from Soissons on the Aisne as far east as Auberive in Champagne.

The French stated that from Soissons to Craonne, 20 miles, the whole German first line position fell into their hands, while to the east of Craonne, where the line turns southeast toward Rheims, the German second line positions south of Juvincourt were occupied by them. South of this, the French pushed forward their line to the outskirts of Bermericourt, about half way between Neufchatel and Rheims, and also reached Loivre and Courcy, southwest and south of Bermericourt, respectively, both places being on the canal connecting the Marne with the Aisne. North of Ville-aux-Bois, a town a little southeast of Craonne, they broke down several strong German counter-attacks by the violence of their artillery fire.

In the battle east of Rheims the French reported the capture of all the German first positions south of Moronvilliers, on a line extending from Prunay to a point on the road connecting St. Hilaire le Grand and St. Souplet, about fifteen miles, quite near to St. Hilaire. North of St. Hilaire the French advance was most marked and both Auberive and the line of hills between Moronvilliers and Vaudesincourt were carried.

Auberive is not very far south of the railroad running east and west through Betheniville, Ste Marie-a-Py and Marne, which is an important part of the German lines of communication.

On April 18, the fighting spread north of Soissons as far as the western end of the French line. South of St. Quentin, during the day, the Germans made two attempts to drive the French out of their positions to the east of the village of Gauchy, which is about two miles directly south of the city.

North of the Aisne, the Germans on April 19 abandoned the positions along the river from Conde to Soupir, retiring to prepared positions, the French following.

Thursday was a day of fierce fighting; perhaps being fiercest in the vicinity of Auberive, in Champagne, where it continued Wednesday night, all day Thursday and well into Thursday night, raging with unabated fury.

The French reported an important gain to the northwest of Auberive, in the capture of a mile and a half of strongly fortified German trenches, with prisoners and artillery, but the Germans stated that these advantages won by the French were compensated by the results of their counter attacks. The French made the definite claim of having captured two German batteries in this region.

Up to Saturday the French claimed to have taken 19,000 prisoners, plus 100 guns, in this offensive, since its beginning, while the Germans claimed the capture of more than 3,000 French.

From St. Quentin north as far as Lens, the English portion of the active battle line, from Sunday to the close of the week there has been no particular change in the situation around Lens, but farther south there was one really hard fight during the week which took place on the road leading from Bapaume to Cambrai on Sunday, April 15. Concerning this the British say that the Germans attacked on a six-mile front and were completely repulsed; the Germans, however, say that the British were the assailants in heavy masses and were repulsed with sanguinary losses.

On Monday there was a hard fight just north of the Arras-Cambrai road wherein the Germans reported driving back the British on Lagnicourt and Boursies, and the capturing of 475 Australians, 22 guns and 15 machine guns, also inflicting severe losses on their opponents.

The rest of the week there were no particularly important activities on this portion of the British front. At the end of the week the British stated that since April 8 they had taken some 15,000 prisoners and about 220 guns.

The news of the sinking of two British hospital ships has reached us during the week. They were the Salta, sunk on April 10 in the British Channel by a mine, 52 persons being lost, and the Gloucester Castle on March 30, torpedoed without loss of life, and also in the Channel. Great Britain reports that during the week ending April 15 there were sunk, in the war zone surrounding the British Isles, British mercantile vessels exceeding 1,600 tons to the number of 19, under 1,600 tons 9, fishing vessels 12. These figures are slightly higher than those of the week before. The Italians reported during the same week the sinking of 5 Italian steamers under 3,500 tons and 2 sailing vessels under 150 tons.

Berlin reports that the present war loan has realized 12,778,000,000 marks. The last loan in the autumn of 1916 produced 10,698,994,990 marks.

In Mesopotamia, northwest of Bagdad, the British scored another victory. On the 17th of April General Maude's army forced a passage of Shatt-el-Adham River, and the following morning attacked the main position of the Turkish 18th Army Corps, near Istabulat station, twelve miles northeast of Samara, on the right bank of the Tigris, defeating the Turks, forcing them to retreat, and taking some prisoners and artillery.

The British High Commission headed by Arthur J. Balfour reached Washington on April 22. Their announced object is to help America avoid Britain's errors in the war, as well as to reach an understanding as to common purposes and action.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, orphan daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement to Helen Barnet, and a month later a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once his father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first two months of the honeymoon were spent in finding a home and trying to live in a flat on $15 a week. This problem was soon solved to Helen's satisfaction by means of a cookbook, price $2.50, and an account at the grocery, which she opened without Burke's knowledge, and which released some of her weekly allowance for an occasional ice cream soda and movie show in company with Mrs. Jones, her neighbor across the hall. The explosion came with the first batch of grocer's bills, and Burke then instructed Helen in the mysteries of bookkeeping so that she could make her accounts balance and live within his salary, and at the same time tried to polish the manners of his rustic wife. One night Burke announced a visit from his friend Dr. Gleason, a traveler and archeologist. Helen at once prepared to receive her husband's "swell" friend.

FOR several weeks now the Denbys had been receiving calls—Burke Denby was a Denby of Denby Mansion even though he was temporarily marooned on Dale Street at a salary of sixty dollars a month. Besides, to many, Dale Street and the sixty dollars, with the contributory elements of elopement and irate parent, only added piquancy and interest to what would otherwise have been nothing but the conventional duty call.

To Helen, in the main, these calls were a welcome diversion—"just grand," indeed. To Burke, on whom the curiosity element was not lost, they were an impertinence and a nuisance. Yet he endured them, and even welcomed them, in a way; for he wanted Helen to know his friends, and to like them—better than she liked Mrs. Jones. He did not care for Mrs. Jones. She talked too loud, and used too much slang. He did not like to have Helen with her. Always, therefore, after callers had been there, his first eager question was: "How did you like them, dear?" He wanted so much that Helen should like them!

Tonight, however, in thinking of the prospective visit from Gleason, he was wondering how the doctor would like Helen—not how Helen would like the doctor. The change was significant but unconscious—perhaps all the more significant because it was unconscious.

Until he had reached home that night, Burke had been so overjoyed at the prospect of an old-time chat with his friend that he had given little thought to Gleason's probable opinion of the Dale Street flat and its furnishings. Now, with his eyes on the obtrusive unharmony all about him, and his memory going back to the doctor's well-known fastidiousness of taste, he could think of little else. He did hope Gleason would not think he had selected those horrors! Of course he had already explained—a little—about his father's disapproval of the marriage, and the resulting cutting-off of his allowance; but even that would not excuse (to Gleason) the riot of glaring reds and pinks and purples in his living-rooms; and one could not very well explain that one's wife liked the horrors—He pulled himself up sharply. Of course Helen herself was a dear. He hoped Gleason would see how dear she was. He wanted Gleason to like Helen.

As the hour drew near for the expected guest's arrival, Burke Denby, greatly to his vexation, found himself growing more and more nervous. He asked himself indignantly if he were going to let a purple cushion entirely spoil the pleasure of the evening. Not until he had seen Gleason that afternoon had he realized how sorely he had missed his father's companionship all these past weeks. Not until he had found himself bubbling over with the things he wanted to talk about that evening had he realized how keenly he had missed the mental stimulus of that father's comradeship. And now, for the sake of a purple cushion, was he to lose the only chance he had had for weeks of conversing with an intelligent——

With an almost audible gasp the shocked and shamed husband pulled himself up again.

Well, of course Helen was intelligent. It was only that she was not interested in, and did not know about, these things he was thinking of; and——

The doorbell rang sharply, and Burke leaped to his feet and hastened to press the button that would release the catch of the lock at the entrance below.

"Why, Burke, you never called down through the tube at all, and asked who it was," remonstrated Helen, hurrying in, her fingers busy with the final fastenings of her dress.

"You bet your life I didn't," laughed Burke, a bit grimly. "You've got another guess coming if you think I'm going to hold Doc Gleason off at the end of a 'Who is it?' bellowed into his ear from that impertinent copper trumpet down there."

"Why, Burke, that's all right. Everybody does it," maintained Helen. "We have to, else we'd be letting all sorts of folks in, and——"

At a warning gesture from her husband she stopped just as a tall, smooth-shaven man with kind eyes and a grave smile appeared at the open hallway door

"Glad to see you, doctor," cried Burke, extending a cordial hand that yet trembled a little. "Let me present you to my wife."

"Pleased to meet you, I'm sure," bobbed Helen. And because she was nervous she said the next thing that came into her head. "And I hope you're pleased to meet me, too. All Burke's friends are so swell, you know, that——"

"Er—ah—" broke in the dismayed husband.

But the visitor advanced quietly, still with that same grave smile, and clasped Mrs. Denby's extended hand.

"I am very sure Burke's friends are, indeed, very glad to meet you," he said. "Certainly I am," he finished, with a cordial heartiness so nicely balanced that even Burke Denby's sensitive alertness could find in it neither the overzealousness of insincerity nor the indifference of disdain.

Even when, a minute later, they turned and went into the living room, Burke's still apprehensive watchfulness could detect in his friend's face not one trace of the dismayed horror he had been dreading to see there.

"Gleason's a brick," he sighed to himself, trying to relax his tense muscles. "As if I didn't know that every last gimcrack in this miserable room would fairly scream at him the moment he entered that door!"

In spite of everybody's very evident efforts to have everything pass off pleasantly, the evening was anything but a success. Helen, at first shy and ill at ease, said little. Then, as if suddenly realizing her deficiencies as a hostess, she tried to remedy it by talking very loud and very fast about anything that came into her mind, reveling especially in minute details concerning their own daily lives, ranging all the way from stories of the elopement and the house-furnishing on the instalment plan to hilarious accounts of her experiences with the cookbook and the account-book.

Very plainly Helen was doing her best to "show off," looking from one to the other with coquettish smiles.

To Gleason her manner said: "You see now why Burke fell in love with me, don't you?" To Burke it said: "There, now I guess you ain't ashamed of me!"

The doctor, still with the grave smile and kindly eyes, listened politely, uttering now and then a pleasant word or two, in a way that even the distraught husband could not criticise. As for the husband himself, between his anger at Helen and his anger at himself because of his anger at Helen, he was in a woeful condition of nervousness and ill-humor. Vainly trying to wrest the ball of conversation from Helen's bungling fingers, he yet felt obliged to laugh in apparent approval at her wild throws. Nor was he unaware of the sorry figure he thus made of himself. Having long since given up all hope of the anticipated chat with his friend, his one aim now was to get the visit over, and the doctor out of the house as soon as possible. Yet the very fact that he did want the visit over and the doctor gone only angered him the more, and put into his mouth words that were a mockery of cordiality. No wonder, then, that for Burke the evening was a series of fidgetings, throat-clearings, and nervous laughs that (if he had but known it) were fully as distressing to the doctor as they were to himself.

At half past nine the doctor rose to his feet.

"Well, good people, I must go," he announced cheerily. (For the last half-hour the doctor had been wondering just how soon he might make that statement.) "It's half past nine."

"Pshaw! That ain't late," protested Helen.

"No, indeed," echoed Burke—though Burke had promptly risen with his guest.

"Perhaps not, to you; but to me—" The doctor let a smile finish his sentence.

"But you're coming again," gurgled Helen. "You're coming to dinner. Burke said you was."

Burke's mouth flew open—but just in time he snapped it shut. He had remembered that hospitable husbands do not usually retract their wives' invitations with a terrified "For heaven's sake, no!"—at least not in the face of the prospective guest. Before he could put the new, proper words into his mouth, the doctor spoke.

"Thank you. You're very kind; but I'm afraid not—this time, Mrs. Denby. My stay is to be very short. But I'm glad to have had this little visit," he finished, holding out his hand.

And again Burke, neither then, nor when he looked straight into the doctor's eyes a moment later, could find aught in word or manner upon which to pin his watchful suspicions.

The next moment the doctor was gone.

Helen yawned luxuriously, openly—Helen never troubled to hide her yawns.

"Now I like him," she observed emphatically, but not very distinctly (owing to the yawn). "If all your swell friends were——"

"Helen, for heaven's sake, isn't there any word but that abominable 'swell' that you can use?" interrupted her husband, seizing the first pretext that offered itself as a scapegoat for his irritation.

Helen laughed and shrugged her shoulders.

"All right; 'stuck up,' then, if you like that better. But, for my part, I like 'swell' best. It's so expressive, so much more swell—there, you see," she laughed, with another shrug; "it just says itself. But, really, I do like the doctor. I think he's just grand. Where does he live?"

"Boston." Burke hated "grand" only one degree less than "swell."

"Is he married?"

"No."

"How old did you say he was?"

"I didn't say. I don't know. Thirty-five, probably."

"Why, Burke, what's the matter? What are you so short about? Don't

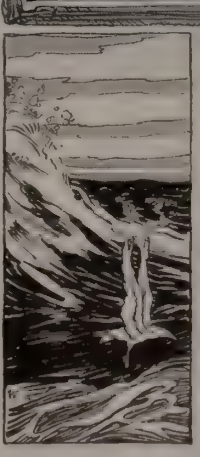
QUARTERDECK SEAS

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.



The waves rolled over the quarterdeck,
The waves were a mountain high!
And we crouched away from the light of day,
And hid from the tempest's eye.
And the waves laughed loud as they stretched their arms,
With a rushing, rasping glee;
And they took our boat in their foam-touched hands,
A prize for the angry sea.
Oh, we hid away from the dashing spray,
Away from the churning tide;
And we huddled still in the cold and chill,
But our thoughts went roaming wide.
And we thought of those who were safe at home,
And we hadn't the time to cry,
While the waves dashed up on the quarterdeck,
For the waves were a mountain high!

DAILY MEDITATION

Hating the Light

SUNDAY, May 6. John 3:20. "Everyone that doeth evil hateth the light." The seedy garments which pass muster in the dull low-grade light of the winter's day reveal their wear and tear in the brighter and more searching light of the spring. We say about a shabby garment: "It is all right for dull days, but I shall want another when the bright days come!" Shabbiness hateth the light. Theatrical stage-effects may have a certain attractiveness in the limelight, but they make a woeful sight when they are brought into the sunshine. Unreality hateth the light. Is there any spectacle more pathetic than the scene of a carnival in the light of the following morning? The daylight makes Vanity Fair look pitiable.

And all these have their moral and spiritual analogies. There is a dull light of worldliness in which evil things do not reveal their terror. There is a moral twilight in which even glaring wrong does not expose its hideousness. There are commonly accepted standards before which even shabby things do not appear mean. They are not brought under condemnation. They are not lifted into relief. They conform to accepted requirements, and the doers of them are not exposed to any discomfort or resentment. But when we bring this crooked conduct or this shabby character into the presence of "the Light of Life" the revelation is astounding. All mere paint and powder and cosmetics shrink from the sunlight; and in the glory of the Lord all our decorated evil and all our powdered hypocrisies show themselves for what they truly are. "Thou judgest us." "Our secret sins are seen in the light of thy countenance."

And we do not like the exposure. We hate the light; we do not hate the sins which it reveals. We value comfort more than we welcome truth. We prefer a low satisfaction in the twilight to a healthy disquietude in the fuller day. I heard a man speak of his minister, and he spake in tones of eulogy, and this is what he said: "I like my minister; he isn't always making me feel uncomfortable!" But how unapostolic was the experience! His minister must have led his devoted hearer into a spiritual twilight, for if he had kept him in the full blaze of "the uncreated beam" he would have been pricked in heart, and he would have cried out, "What must I do to be saved?"

We are moving upward when we can humbly pray for the ministry of the eternal Light. "Search out our wickedness, O Lord, until thou find none!" In such prayerful lives the light that searches and exposes the sin also consumes the unworthiness it reveals. "Our God is a consuming fire." J. H. J.

Those That Seek Me Early

MONDAY, May 7. Prov. 8:17. "I love them that love me; and those that seek me early shall find me." The child is the true citizen of the kingdom of God. We know this on the highest authority. Jesus taught grown people that they must become like little children in order to enter into the Kingdom of heaven. We make a great mistake when we teach little children that they must become like grown folks in order to be good Christians. Knowing this, and believing this with all our hearts, nevertheless there is such a thing as child-conversion. Perhaps it may make it seem more natural if we think of it as child-decision. Count Zinzendorf began earnestly to seek after God in his fourth year, and he was only a child when he framed a covenant which ran thus: "Be thou mine, dear Saviour, and I will be thine," a covenant which was often afterward renewed. At the age of nineteen he said, "Eternity alone fills my thought." At a later period he wrote, "I am as ever a poor sinner, a captive of eternal love, running by the side of his triumphal chariot, and have no desire to be anything else as long as I live." The Earl of Shaftesbury was not yet seven years of age when his heart yearned after a knowledge of God. His faithful nurse touched the chords and awakened the first music of his spiritual life by telling him the story of Jesus' birth and death. Alfred Cookman sought and obtained a divine experience of grace at ten years of age. Isaac Watts definitely decided to live for God at nine years of age. Robert Hall became a Christian at twelve, and Jonathan Edwards, greatest of American logicians and theologians, was converted at seven.

It is one of the most significant findings of students of varieties of Christian experience that a vast majority of Christians arrive at a decision concerning Christ, and enter into covenant with God, during the years from twelve to eighteen. These are the fateful years. Joseph Cook called them "tender teens." Only one who seeks God early can know the joy of perfect obedience. Augustine confessed, "Too late I loved thee, thou Ancient of Days, yet ever new."

With His Stripes We Are Healed

TUESDAY, May 8. Isa. 53:4, 5. "Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." This text is a marvel in the Old Testament: nowhere from Genesis to Malachi have the imputed guilt of the Servant of Jehovah and the imputed righteousness of the Servant's clients been painted in stronger colors.

The same contrast that meets us here has been set forth in glaring opposites by Paul in Rom. 5:12–21. Do you wonder at the amazement of the Ethiopian treasurer who was poring over this chapter in Isaiah while journeying from Jerusalem to Gaza? Thousands since have repeated the perplexed question of the African student: "Of whom speaketh the prophet this?" This is the mystery of the ages, the paradox of Calvary, the scorn of proud thinkers and the stumbling-block of the self-righteous. "God hath made him who knew no sin to be sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him"—that is what this prophetic utterance means stated in New Testament terms.

The cross on Golgotha is like a magnet that draws to itself the vast iniquities of the world's transgressions through all the ages before and after Christ. The pale Sufferer on the hill outside of the gate of Jerusalem succumbs to smitings that were destined for his human brethren. They—if they will rightly interpret this spectacle of vicarious woe—should feel an intense feeling of relief steal into their guilty hearts. The hand that inflicted these griefs does not strike a second time for the same offenses: "The chastisement of our peace was upon him." Out of this ordeal of the afflicted Jesus there comes the peace of God that passeth all understanding. That "gory head and wounded," reclining in death with the cry of satisfaction; "It is finished!" is to be a blessed sight to the sinner when he comes to breathe his last. "With his stripes we are healed." W. H. T. D.

Life Through His Death

WEDNESDAY, May 9. Rom. 5:8. "Christ died for us." A great sinner was once saved by having this sentence flashed upon his soul: "He died my death for me that I might live his life for him." Jesus died that he might save us from the death that never dies and give the life that lives forever more. He paid all the debt you owe. His blood washes white as snow.

Herodotus tells us that when Cyrus, on his way to India, captured Tigranes and his army, he compelled him to surrender all his kingdom for his life. Cyrus then asked Tigranes how he would redeem his father and mother. He immediately offered for them all his remaining treasure, and they were ordered to stand aside. Then came another awful question. "With what will you redeem your wife?" A look of horror flushed his noble face. At last, lifting his head, he exclaimed, "O Cyrus, I will redeem her; I will die for her if you will restore her liberty." Cyrus, greatly moved by the heroic words, ordered the immediate release of both. In the evening Tigranes said to his wife, "Were you not struck by the noble appearance of Cyrus?" "No," she replied, "I was not looking at Cyrus." "To whom were you looking?" She pressed her hands to her bosom, and with eyes streaming with tears replied, "I was looking at the man who offered to redeem me with his life!"

One day we shall see the face of Him who not only offered, but did give his life for his Bride, the Church of the living God. No other attraction will be like him who died for a race, that they might be able to exclaim, "I know that my Redeemer liveth; though once he was dead, yet now he is alive forever more!"

Prayer and Power

THURSDAY, May 10. Isa. 40:29. "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." One significant discovery of our time in the realm of physics is that the source of much if not all of the physical energy in the world is solar. Most of the energies with which we deal daily, in agriculture and in the arts, useful and ornamental, in commerce and industry, are derived from the sun. The great discovery in the realm of religion is that moral power also has a source and center. What is it in the moral universe which corresponds to the sun in our solar system? It is God. Power belongs to him and to him alone. Is there power in moral law? He is the Author of moral law. Is there power in conscience? He is the Enkindler and Invigorator of conscience. Is there power in grace, in love, in good will? He is the Giver of grace, he is Love. Christ is the Alpha and Omega of good will.

What is prayer? Briefly stated, it is the quest for God. All men pray at times, but differently. The Buddhist has his prayer-wheel. The Roman Catholic has his beads. Are they praying? Yes, in so far as they are seeking God. But this is not prayer at the best. This is lame reaching after God, blind groping after him. There is a more excellent way; a way of direct access to the Source of power. Prayer is not a soliloquy nor a monologue, but a dialogue. They who think much about God and accustom themselves to converse with him, in time become not alone conscious of his presence but conscious of union with him. We are not absorbed in God, but we abide in him. And if we do, earth has no darkness which may not thus be changed to light. C. C. A.

The Foundation of Faith

FRIDAY, May 11. Ps. 18:46. "The Lord liveth; and blessed be my rock; and let the God of my salvation be exalted." If the sad company that wended their way to the sepulcher of Jesus on that memorable Easter morning and were hailed by the angel: "Why seek ye the living among the dead?"—if Peter and John after verifying the resurrection of the Lord—if the whole company of the disciples among whom the risen Lord appeared suddenly on the evening of that day had searched the literature of their church for an appropriate expression of the joy that was surging in their hearts at the sight of their beloved Master, they could not have found a more fitting one than this jubilant cry of David.

May not we who are always reading the Old Testament in the light of the New thus greet the victorious Champion of our cause as we bend in glad contemplation over the mighty miracle of his resurrection? his death was a sore trial to the faith of his followers. Think of Cleopas! His return to life must have dissipated any doubt that existed anywhere in his divine personality and his redeeming work. This living Christ is the God of our salvation. The Father has sealed the mission of his son with his unmistakable approval by bringing again from the dead that great Shepherd, our Lord Jesus Christ. In the rising of the Lord our faith finds its granite foundation. Without it our faith would be vain; we would yet be in our sins. Now that he has proven that he could not be holden by death, he is become the Rock on which our confidence and hope settle. He quiets our palpitating hearts, he bears up our trembling faith, he revives our dying hope, with the assurance: "Because I live, ye shall also live."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee." W. H. T. D.

The Mother Love

SATURDAY, May 12. Isa. 49:15. "Can a woman forget her child? . . . Yet will I not forget thee." The best of human beings fail to be true at times, but mother love is more constant than any other human, earthly affection. There is never a prison where she would not knock for the liberation of her child; her love does not change because of misfortune or unfaithfulness.

A degenerate mother in the toils of Satan's power might forget, but there is One who remembers always to love the objects of his affection. He will never leave and never forget. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." A mother would give her drunken son the last crust of bread in the house; if expostulated with, she would say, "How can I help it? I am his mother. I would give him all and then die for him, for I was willing to give my life for him at his birth." Though all other friends forsake her child, though the law may seize him and the gallows slay him, her pitying affection will never give him up, and on his grave she will refuse to be comforted, because he is not.

"If I were drowned in the deepest sea,
Mother o' mine, mother o' mine,
I know whose prayers would come down to me,
Mother o' mine, mother o' mine." E. W. C.

Back to Calvary

ONE of the striking facts brought out by ministers, evangelists and Y. M. C. A. workers who have mingled with the soldiers in the trenches is that there is practically no denominational or creed line in the worship. In a notable account of his experiences at the front, Gipsy Smith tells how he passed from camp to camp, holding services in the shelter huts with men of all creeds as his auditors. If the preacher has a plain Gospel message, they are all glad to listen; if otherwise, they simply drift away. To the great truths of religion they lend an attentive and reverent ear, as befits men who stand face to face with death at all hours, and who many times "have felt the breath of the other world fan their faces." Their eyes glisten as they are reminded of the Fatherhood of God, of his love and care for all of his children alike who call upon his name, and of their need of Jesus Christ as a Saviour and Friend.

It would be well for the church to take note of the attitude of these poor fellows toward religion, and to see whether it does not throw a new light on the real needs of the human soul. These men care only for the vital truths of Christianity; they have no time for anything else. A learned exposition of theological views would be unthinkable to set before men who may be called to die the next hour. So it is with all of us. Life is uncertain and time is precious. Those who survive the war will bring back with them a new estimate of the value of the Christian ministry —an estimate based on the teachings of Christ himself—and of their direct application to the spiritual needs of the multitudes.

The churches must go back to Calvary and the great Sacrifice, if they desire to draw the people in the years to come.

Saving the Foodstuffs

THERE is no lack of urging toward more intensive production of foodstuffs. The gravity of the situation cannot be exaggerated. The world needs much more food than was produced last year—imperatively needs it—and the United States is the only country having facilities for making up the deficiencies. An incalculable burden has devolved upon the American farmer. Every square inch of soil must be used to its highest possible productivity.

And yet every practical man, farmer, shipper or dealer, knows that the mere production is by no means the larger part of the problem of the world food-supply today. The preservation of this increased produce from damage and decay in shipment and in storage for the winter is involved in difficulties almost insuperable. Canners, hitherto, have greatly helped in overcoming such difficulties, but now there are no cans, because tin has given out.

The former common custom of turning grass and grains into meat for their preservation and easier shipment has long been failing. Today there are 10,000,000 fewer beef animals in this country than there were in 1900. And there are 26,000,000 more persons.

Of what avail the cultivation of hundreds of thousands more acres and the increase of production, if the yield can be eaten only during the short period when it is fresh?

This is the grave and intricate problem to which the Agricultural Department is devoting itself earnestly. One of the most promising means of increasing the meat supply lies in the small meat animals. The raising of sheep for mutton is strongly urged. Hogs can be a mighty factor. The item of poultry alone, now $500,000,000 a year, might be doubled or tripled very quickly. It is pointed out that one of the cheapest meats that can be raised is that of Belgian hares, which multiply and grow with amazing rapidity. In any of these matters the Agricultural Department will furnish full and expert advice on request.

But after all, it is upon the fruits and vegetables we must depend, as always, for our main nutrition. And their preservation and distribution in sound condition is the critical problem. In this crisis we have much to learn from Europe. They have perfected a process of dehydrating vegetables and fruits and thus preserving all their nutritive qualities indefinitely and at the same time enormously reducing their bulk for storage and shipment. It simply takes out the water, leaving everything of value in a dry, compact state. Germany had more than 400 plants for this treatment of foodstuffs as early as 1914, and the number has been greatly increased during the war. In this country we have three. We ought to have at least three thousand.

We cannot produce too much. But the intelligent farmer, in increasing his production, will also vastly increase the service of his products and enhance his own profits by studying these practical methods of best preserving and most readily marketing his produce.

The prevention of waste is quite as important as the increase of production.

The Art of Boiling Down

MARTIN LUTHER, in giving nine qualities of a good preacher, gives as the sixth that he should know when to stop. If terminal facilities four centuries ago were necessary, how much more in this age of lightning movement and multiplicity of services? When wireless telephone messages girdle the globe eight times during a heartbeat, should not sermons endeavor to come in on the limited—that is, limited to about thirty minutes?

Most churches hold three services every Sunday, besides expecting members to attend Y. M. C. A. and young people's meetings between times. Therefore the greater need for brevity. Boil down the long prayers introductory to the sermon; the late comers standing in the entry for fifteen minutes often whisper, "How long, O Lord, how long?" Boil down bulletin-board notices; what a sameness announcements have, fifty-two Sundays of the year! Put them on the calendar to be read, not expounded. Long preparatory exercises often take the life of the sermon; they make it bleed at the wrong time. When the minister is finally prepared to preach, the sermon has expired, only needing the perfunctory performance of burial, while the devotional spirit of the auditors has been dissipated. "Boiling down" is the spirit of the age; let us have bullet words, concentrated sentences, epigrammatic phrases, brief introductions, pointed appeals.

A clergyman asked his little son if he could tell what the sermon was about. The lad replied, "About ten minutes too long." The "Amen" was the best part of the discourse.

Some books, like some sermons, are mostly words, words, words; a basketful of straw, with one grain of wheat, not worth boiling down. Does it not require more genius to condense than to elaborate? Lincoln's two-minute, immortal Gettysburg address showed greater ability than Everett's two hours of rhetorical eloquence.

The Muzzling of the Press

IN waging a war for democracy abroad it would be well not to forget democracy at home. Any citizen of true American instincts who will read, even casually, the press restriction clause of the Espionage Bill must be amazed and startled by its sharp and irreconcilable conflict with the American spirit and with the clearly stated guarantees of the Constitution.

On its face this measure purports to shield our military and naval secrets from foreign foes; but in fact is would operate not only to muzzle but to blindfold our own people to every military and naval expenditure and operation. For citizens to know, or even inquire, what is being done in the way of militarism with millions and billions of their money should not be made a crime.

Yet, under the proposed measure, the people are to have no privilege but to pay, and no information but that in the tax list. To protest, to know, to express criticism, or even to inquire, means summary imprisonment.

The best that can be said of such a measure as this is that it would not and could not be generally enforced. The American spirit would not tolerate it. But such a law, sleeping in the statutes, would offer boundless opportunity for the venting of personal and official spites, and for open injustice during high tides of public feeling. In its very essence this measure is utterly alien to American ideals of liberty and constitutional freedom of speech and the press.

"It Might Have Been Worse"

THE thought that "it might have been worse" has carried all of us through grave troubles and would carry us serenely through all the petty worries of every day, if we would but let it.

"It might have been worse" is a consoling reflection that will apply in any crisis, however serious. For no single event can represent all the possible elements of disaster. To nobody in this world has there happened anything that might not have been worse. Death, indeed, seems to exact all; but it does not. And the deepest griefs are so deadening to the senses that they bring their own balm.

If we had no troubles but the great and real, this world would be a very happy dwelling-place. It is the little worries that, if we permit them to survive from yesterday and anticipate them for tomorrow, enlarging them through the lenses of imagination and fear, eat out the heart of hope and sicken us unto despair.

Anyway, troubles are like ghosts—they are terrifying at a little distance; but when you come bravely to lay your hands on them, there's nothing there.

It sounds paradoxical, but it is true, that the real troubles are unreal; it is only the worries that are real. The first strengthen and develop us; the last depress and kill. For the universe operates under fixed laws so immutable that there can be no accident, no disaster, nor actual cause for worry, except as the mind admits it.

"It might have been worse" is a good thought with which to smile away all the worry phantoms and the goblins of fear and despair.

Love or Hate?

IS your life controlled more largely by your likes, your loves, or by your dislikes, your hates? It would be well to think about this searchingly.

Malice, envy, resentment, hard thoughts of any sort, poison first the heart in which they originate. They make a brackish, unhealthful pool, where all kinds of bad mental conditions will generate.

It is only in our loves that we really live.

What we hate is dead to us, and the wider the range of our hates, the narrower our lives.

It is a beautiful belief that every kindly act, word, thought or impulse continues in its influence forever, brightening and sweetening the world, and that every evil deed or thought permanently destroys a part of the sum total of human happiness. Certainly this is the effect upon the life in which the thought originates. Every thought elevates or lowers, purifies or debases.

Love thoughts are wings. Hate thoughts are weights.

Your own feeling is reflected back to you from others. If you give love you get love. It is one of the things the more of which you give the more you have. Love is born a twin, and cannot exist without its counterpart. It is your own attitude that attracts or repels others. According as we love or hate, we surround ourselves with an atmosphere of inviting sweetness, or hedge ourselves in with a barbed-wire fence. People are lovely to you or hateful, just as you love them or hate them. This is not mere seeming, but one of the truest actualities in the world.

Love is the light in which we see and live. Hates are malarial mists in which we blindly grope and miserably die.

What We Owe

WE owe a debt to the people of the past and the present, as well as to posterity. All the strength of body, power of mind and wealth of gold which the past has bequeathed to us, we should pass on to others. If we have added to our riches of mind, soul and treasure, of ideals and attainments, should we not share these with our fellows? In doing so, would we not incorporate our requirements into unchangeable character? Is it not true that the more we give, the more we hold in soul solution?

If we would live afterward, live now, in usefulness and devotion to the world about us. It is thus we become immortal in our influence in this life, with hopes of its being perpetuated in the life eternal. Live now for the best ideals if you would live forever for your highest self.

Jesus said, "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give unto your bosom." If our benevolence overloads us with like benefits from others, what will not God, the Infinite Giver, bestow on his self-sacrificing children? He will give us a Pentecost that makes a Paradise even in this world. If we turn our grasping into giving, love will become a universal law, as every one adopts the motto, "What is mine is thine." Shakespeare says,

"It is twice blessed;
It blesses him that gives and him that takes."

Another poet says,

"Have you had a kindness shown?
'Twas not given for you alone;
Let it travel down the years,
Let it wipe another's tears,
Till in heaven the deed appears,
Pass it on! Pass it on!"

Has Plenty, Yet Starving

AN old man of seventy, living at Chicopee, Mass., was found starving the other night by a police sergeant. The officer broke open the door, which was barricaded with a crowbar and a lawnmower, and found the man on an old-fashioned wooden bed. For a pillow he had a heap of dirty quilts, carpets and rags. A physician was called, who said the man was dying from starvation, and ordered an ambulance to take him to the hospital. While waiting for the ambulance, the doctor asked the man if he had any money. The old man answered, "It is everywhere around the house." Sure enough, they found it in back of bookcases and pictures, in cracks, and so forth. There were four bank books, showing deposits in banks in Chicopee and Springfield amounting to $4,500, a bag of gold containing $90, and a roll of over $700 in bills. With all that cash, the interest of which would have supported him in comfort, he was so stingy that he would not get enough food to keep him from literally starving to death. A second cousin is the only kin he has. At the hospital they put him in a nice room, with every convenience, at his own expense. His love of money dwarfed and crazed him. He is not much more crazy than the money-mad man who lives in a palace, has public prestige, enjoys social favor, but has no motive in life besides making one dollar become two dollars, and cannot see the happiness it may bring to his fellows, or the good it may do mankind in the establishment of Christ's Kingdom on earth. Christ addresses such persons in the parable as "Thou fool," and continues: "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God." (Luke 12 : 21.)

Skimmed Milk Praised

MILK from which the cream has been taken, commonly called "skim-milk," is poorly estimated by public sentiment, and its use is forbidden by law in some cities, and hence it is generally fed to the pigs. Professor John Phillips Street, chemist of the Connecticut Agricultural Station, has published an article in the Forecast in which he claims that the discounted skim-milk is more nutritious than whole milk or cream by itself. Of it he says: "It contains practically all of the protein, sugar and mineral salts. In the ordinary mixed diet, moreover, a sufficient amount of fat is supplied by meat, butter, lard, and so forth, so that the loss of this ingredient from the milk is of little importance. Protein, on the other hand, being the most costly of the food elements, is the one most likely to be lacking in inexpensive meals. For those who have to figure cost closely, therefore, skim-milk offers a very valuable source of the most expensive element of the dietary. It is the cheapest available source of animal protein at the present time." These views of Professor Street are so new and so contradictory to opinions held from time immemorial on the subject that it is likely that consumers will await other experiments of science corroborating the new theory, and that for the present they will eat the sweet, velvety cream and let the pigs have the skim-milk. As the Hebrews were a pastoral people, milk was a very convenient article of diet. There is this referecne to it: "And he took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat." (Gen. 18 : 8.)

A School on Wheels

A SCHOOL on wheels. We have heard much of the Little Red Schoolhouse, but the future leader of the South may refer to his school-days in the movable school. The section hands on many of the railroads lead a wandering life—in one location for a few months, and then possibly in a different county or state. Many are married and have children. This produced a school problem that has been solved by fitting a car as a schoolhouse and installing a teacher The car is moved as the work changes, and while the interior of the car remains the same there is a constant change in "the school yard." A different view is framed by the windows, and the play-hours are fine to explore new country. The chances for observation work in botany, geology, etc., are doubled, and the experiment is proving a splendid success. There is nothing in our American national life more elemental than the education and moral development of the children who are so soon to become the fathers and mothers of the home, factors in the professional and industrial world, sovereign rulers of our Republic, and members of the church of Christ. The enterprise and wisdom of our philanthropic age is seen in this novel plan for educating the children who under their migratory condition would very likely grow up in ignorance, a handicap to themselves and a menace to society. This education of the mind of the child is a good preparation for the education of the soul by the home, the Sunday school and the church. The religious instruction of the young generation is specifically enjoined on Moses by the Almighty in these words: "And I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children." (Deut. 4 : 10.)

Dug for Baby's Coffin

A YOUNG woman with disordered clothing and bleeding hands was found recently in a cemetery near Middle Village in Queens County, New York, kneeling beside a baby's grave in which she had dug a two-foot hole. To the attendant all she would say was "I must have my baby! I must have my baby!" She had worked all night scratching away the dirt with her fingers. She was taken by the authorities to the hospital for treatment. The poor young mother had lost her reason by grief for the death of her darling child. Mother's love is so strong that the going away of the baby has often produced temporary and even permanent derangement of the mind. The only comfort in such an hour is the blessed Holy Spirit, the vision of the beautiful heaven in which our loved ones are safely housed, and the revelation of which Christ said, "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions." (John 14 : 1, 2.)

Insure 4,000 Employees

A GROUP policy for $3,000,000 was issued the other day by a life insurance company to a leading business house in a large city for the insurance of its 4,000 employees. It was taken out in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the firm, and in recognition of loyal service on the part of the employees. A policy was given to every man, woman and child in the store for one year with a minimum of $500 and a maximum of $1,000. This is a gracious act that will save much worry in families, and will likely prove to be a piece of good business policy. The insuring of the body is important, that of the soul is all-important. In earthly insurance policies a person has to die to win, and he does not get the benefit, but his family does. In the insurance of the soul there has to be physical death to win the ultimate treasure, but it goes to the one insured: it is an endowment policy with fabulous riches bestowed upon the beneficiary in that realm of glorious wealth. There are those who take out worthless insurance policies on the soul in creeds and institutions that are not solvent, and there are grievous disappointments in store for them; but in Christ the insurance of the soul is secure. The apostle thus makes mention of the security: "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." (II Tim. 1 : 12.)

Breach of Promise Suit

A QUEER breach of promise suit was entered in the courts of one of our large cities. It was that of a young man suing a woman for breaking an engagement to be married to him. The report stated that he did not worry so much for any wounded love, but that he had gone to the expense of buying a new suit of clothes for the occasion, with which he could have dispensed had it not been for the engagement. Besides, he said her action had humiliated him in the eyes of his companions, and in his job. It was intimated that the man expected that the girl was going to come into some money, and that its loss had broken his heart most. A man is a big baby to sue a woman for a money damage for a breach of promise of marriage. The action on both sides illustrates the light and trivial estimate so many have of the marital relation. Many contracts for marriage are for cold-blooded money, business, or economic reasons; many from fickle fancy and blind impulse, instead of from mutual love based on respect. The public conscience itself is so dulled on the subject that the number of divorces is increasing at an alarming rate, and has become a menace to the highest national life. The Hebrews had very strict views of betrothal and marriage. Christ's expressed opinion on the subject is the highest earthly ideal. He counted it so sacred that it is thus used as a symbol of the intimate relation between Christ and the Church. "Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." (Rev. 21 : 9.)

The Ancient Mariner

CAPTAIN JOHN LYON, skipper of the ferryboat across the Hudson River between Nyack and Tarrytown, on April 3 entered on his sixty-fourth year of continuous service for the same company, and is said to be the oldest skipper around Greater New York. He is often referred to by his old passengers as "the Ancient Mariner." He is a veteran member of the church and servant of the Lord Jesus. In his temporal employment and religious service he has been obedient to this injunction: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (Rev. 2 : 10.)

Billy Sunday on "Three Groups"

A Sermon Preached in the New York Tabernacle April 22*

TEXT—Matt. 26 : 22. "And they were exceeding sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I?"

GOD created man and placed him in the Garden of Eden, and gave him an explicit command, and man disobeyed, with the full knowledge of the penalty ringing in his ears, for God said: "In the day thou eatest of the fruit thou shalt surely die."

The Lord did not mean a period of twenty-four hours, but did mean that man would pass a crisis in his career. Adam ate of the forbidden fruit, and this world became a graveyard. If man had not sinned we never would have died. All the misery, all the disease, all the heartache have come through sin. The hearse backs up in front of our homes and drives away with our loved ones because of sin.

But when man sinned God gave the promise, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." In the fullness of time Jesus came into the world in fulfilment of that promise. He opened the eyes of the blind, stilled the tempest, fed the multitude with five loaves and two fishes, cast out devils and raised the dead. He demonstrated by word and deed that he was the Son of God. The Jews spurned and repudiated his claim, and their enmity finally culminated in His crucifixion. But before that heartrending tragedy was enacted several incidents occurred, from one of which I take my text.

Jesus said to his disciples: "Go your way into the village over against you, and you will find a colt tied, and bring him to me. And if any man ask you, 'Why do ye this?' say 'The Lord hath need of him'; and straightway he will send him hither." And the disciples went their way and found the colt tied in front of a house where two ways met, and there was a crowd of men loafing about the place; and if they were in any way like the bunch in our day, they were whittling, cursing, chewing tobacco, discussing financial, political and all other public questions.

The disciples began untying the colt, when one fellow, who spits tobacco juice enough to drown a rabbit, calls out: "Hey, there! What are you doing? What are you going to do with that colt?" The disciples call back: "The Lord hath need of him." So away they go with the colt to where Jesus was, and he on its back enters the city of Jerusalem on his famous triumphal entry.

A GREAT multitude followed, shouting: "Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" They spread their garments on the ground in front of Jesus. They cut down branches from the trees. They paved his way with flowers. You would have thought by their acclaim that then and there they would crown him, but let us wait and see.

Jesus said to Peter and John: "You go on, and you will meet a man bearing a pitcher of water. You will follow him into the house he enters, and say to the good man of the house: 'Where is the guest chamber?' He will show you an upper room furnished; there make ready."

Jesus desired to eat the passover feast with his disciples. That night at the table, Peter noticed that Jesus looked sad and troubled. Turning to John, who was one of the favored disciples, he said: "Ask him what's the matter." John said: "Master, you look worried. What is it?" Jesus replied: "One of you shall betray me." Peter asked in the words of my text: "Lord, is it I?" John also asked: "Lord, is it I?"

And Judas, the arch traitor, had the cheek and audacity to look Jesus in the face and ask: "Lord, is it I?" when for days he had been bartering and bickering to betray Jesus to the Pharisees for thirty pieces of silver, or about $15.95 in our money. Jesus replied: "It is he to whom I give the sop." So saying, he dipped it in the dish and handed the sop to Judas, saying: "That thou doest, do quickly." Pricked to the heart by the words of Jesus, Judas leaped to his feet, and, because he was treasurer of the little apostolic band, seized the money bag and left the room.

And when they had sung a hymn, Jesus, with the remaining eleven disciples, went out and crossed the Brook Kedron and entered into the Garden of Gethsemane. This brings me to the subject of my sermon: The Three Groups in the Garden.

THEY were not grouped by their rating in Bradstreet or Dun. Every man classified himself and you do the same. You are where you are because Jesus knows he cannot trust you in a more responsible place. Judas classified himself with the enemies of God.

The first group was near the edge of the garden; the second group farther in the garden; while Jesus, we are told, was a stone's throw farther on. The first group of disciples was so near the edge of the garden that they would have had only a short distance to go to have been outside where Judas was, with the scribes and Pharisees and the mob.

I am sorry to say it, but it's the truth. The truth is not always pleasant to hear, but it's profitable for all who will profit by the truth. The first group is analogous to the position of a large percentage of members in the average church today. They live such a selfish, indifferent, apathetic, "good Lord, good devil," milk-and-chalk, cider-and-vinegar sort of life that it's hard to tell whether they are in the church or in the world. I detest any man who will trim his sails to catch a passing breeze of popularity, and fight under a doubtful flag. I love to see a person come clear out for God, without compromise.

The nearer the relationship the stronger are the ties of obligation. I owe to Mrs. Sunday and our children that which I do not owe to any other woman or children in the world, because of my relationship. You owe to your wife and children that which you do not owe to any other beings. I owe to Jesus that which I do not owe to the world. I testify of the world that its deeds are evil. I do not care whether they hiss me or damn me. Jesus said: "The world will hate you as it hateth me." "Woe unto thee when all men speak well of thee." One of the most uncomplimentary things that can be said at your funeral is that you had no enemies. If you live an uncompromising life for Christ, you will have enemies.

The nearer the relationship the greater the provocation. I could in one act break my wife's heart and bring disgrace upon my children; but that act would not put a tear in your eye. Why? Because all the interest you have toward me is that I may entertain or instruct you, and perhaps your concern ends there.

I have imagined that the conduct of multitudes who are in the church must almost break the heart of Christ. God has the right to say, "I did not send my Son into the world to bathe it in blood and tears, and open his veins with the cruel instrument of the cross, to redeem you to serve the flesh and the devil, but to serve me. I want your influence, your time, your money, your prayers, your tears."

EIGHT in the first group. Three in the second group. Jesus alone forms the third. The largest number in the first group. Farthest from Jesus. Nearest to the world. That has always been true of every church that I knew anything about. Ask the minister for a list of his members; then sit down and check off the prayer meeting members. You will find the largest number nearer the card party and wine supper; closer to the world than to the cross or Christ.

Somebody said to Daniel Webster when he was a boy: "What are you going to be when you are a man?" "A lawyer," he replied. "But the profession is overrun." Webster answered: "There is plenty of room at the top." The nearer you get to Jesus the more elbow room you will have, and the less the crowd. The most glorious exploits do not always furnish us the clearest index of the vices or virtues of men and women. Sometimes a word, an act, a gesture; your absence or your presence will give a clearer insight into your manhood or womanhood, or lack of both, than some deed of bravery or act of prowess.

Let us talk with Jesus a minute. "Jesus, how many disciples have you?" "I had twelve. I have but eleven now." "Where is the missing one?" "He has gone to betray me." "And yet with eleven left you are praying all alone?" Just like many a minister with hundreds of members, and bearing the burden all alone.

Judas bought a ticket for hell for thirty pieces of silver, and it wasn't a round trip ticket, either. Let us go talk with the eight.

No, Judas never suspected that Jesus was near that bunch in the first group. Judas knew that crowd. He knew that first group out near the edge of the garden, through and through. Why do I think so? I will tell you. Jesus had gone up on the Mount of Transfiguration, taking with him Peter, James and John, members of the second group, and while he was away, a father whose boy was possessed of a devil came to the disciples who composed the first group, out near the edge of the garden, and besought them to cast the devil out of his boy. Jesus had given his disciples power against unclean spirits, to drive them out; but instead of doing the work he gave them to do, they spent the time chewing the rag about who would be greatest in the kingdom.

When Jesus returned from the mount the sorrowing father ran to him with his boy, crying, "If thou canst do anything, have compassion on us and help us. I brought my son to thy disciples and they could not cast the devil out!"

That "if" implies a doubt. Failure on the part of those disciples to keep in touch with Jesus, so they could have the power to cast out the devils, led the poor old father to doubt the power of Jesus. The divine philosophy, as demonstrated by thousands of church members, breeds more infidels than all the Paines, Parkers and Ingersolls combined.

I said to a minister one time, "How many members have you?" He said: "Eight hundred and seventy-two; but there are 278 I do not count." I asked: "Out of the number you do not count how many are helping in the meetings; singing in the choir, ushering or doing personal work?" Tears flowed down his cheeks as he said: "The largest number I have been able to muster any one night was twenty-eight, and if my life depended on my making the number fifty I would die."

MY father enlisted four months before I was born. He went to the front with Company F, Twenty-third Iowa infantry, but he never came back. He died and was buried at Camp Patterson, Mo. I have had to battle my way since I was six years old. I know all about the dark and seamy side of life. If ever a man fought hard every inch of his way, I have.

One day mother said: "Boys, I am going to send you to the Soldiers' Orphans' home at Glenwood." We had to go to Ames to take the train. We went to a little hotel to wait, and about 1 o'clock some one came and said, "Get ready for the train; it's coming."

I looked into mother's face. Her eyes were red; her hair was disheveled. I asked: "What's the matter, mother?" All the time Ed and I slept, mother had been praying. We went to the train. Mother put one arm about me and the other about Ed and sobbed as if her heart would break. People walked by and looked at us, but they didn't say a word. Why? They didn't know, and if they had, they wouldn't have cared. Mother knew; she knew that for years she wouldn't see her boys.

We got into the train and cried, "Goodby, mother!" as the train pulled out. We reached Council Bluffs. It was cold and we turned up our little coat collars over our necks and shivered. We saw a hotel and went up and asked a woman for something to eat. She said: "What's your name?" I said, "My name is William Sunday, and this is my brother Ed." "Where are you going?" "Going to the Soldiers' Orphans' home at Glenwood." She wiped her tears and said: "My husband was a soldier and he never came back. He wouldn't turn any one away, and I certainly won't turn you boys away." She threw her arms about us and said, "Come on in." She gave us our breakfast and our dinner, too.

There wasn't any train going out on the Burlington until afternoon. We played around the yards. We saw a freight train standing there, so we climbed into the caboose. The conductor came along and said, "Where is your money?" "Ain't got any." "Where's your tickets?" "Ain't got any." "You can't ride without money or tickets. I'll have to put you off."

We commenced to cry. My brother handed him a letter of introduction to the superintendent of the orphans' home. The conductor read it; handed it back as the tears rolled down his cheeks; then said: "Just sit still, boys. It won't cost you a cent to ride on my train."

It's only twenty miles from Council Bluffs to Glenwood, and as we rounded the curve the conductor said: "There is the home on the hill."

Mother knew. Ed didn't know. I didn't know. I went to sleep. So did Ed; but mother knew. She prayed.

JESUS knew. He prayed. Peter, James and John went to sleep. You can't make me believe that if you knew you would act as you do. If you will tell me how much you read the Bible, how much you pray, how much you do to help people to Jesus Christ, I will tell you to what figures you point on the spiritual thermometer. The trouble is, you will be in the church on Sunday morning, and will keep a little spot about seventeen inches square warm for half an hour; listen to the sermon; pick up a book and sing, "Jesus paid it all," when you have debts that are outlawed. He doesn't pay them. He doesn't pay for that hat, or that set of false teeth you are wearing. You get up and say, "I am standing on solid rock." You are probably standing in a pair of shoes you haven't paid for yet. Let's get cleaned up for God, and see if the Lord won't do great things. He will not send the wind to drive our ships, unless we have faith to lift our sails.

To the members of the first group Jesus said, "Sit ye here." To those of the second group he said, "Watch and pray." His duty was to bear the sins of the world. There are multitudes in the church that do nothing. They are mere cyphers. At a funeral the preacher failed to appear. The undertaker thought it would be a downright shame to put the man away without something being said, and so concluded to make a few remarks himself. So he cleared his throat, and in a pious whine said: "Dear friends, this corpse has been a member of this church for forty years!"

The vociferations of the infuriated mob, demanding that Christ be crucified, shook the temple from foundation to turret top. Often in civil strife had been witnessed some such animosity and hatred of the multitudes. Had we been there and had God given us power of vision, we might have seen the hilltops covered with angels and the air filled with heavenly hosts, all breathlessly gazing upon that scene. The archangel opens the door of heaven and cries:

*In delivering this sermon, which was furnished to the Christian Herald by Robert Matthews, secretary to Mr. Sunday, the evangelist introduced a number of variations, as is his custom, to fit the message to his audience.

"Oh, Jesus, if you want me to come to your help, raise your head and look this way, and I will come with a legion of angels." But Jesus clenched his fingers over the nails in his hands and suffered on. Why? To open up a plan of salvation, which, if we will accept, will keep us out of hell.

How many will go with Jesus to the last ditch? Thousands will, but there are many who, like the disciples, follow him to the garden, but forsake him at the cross. How many will say with Jesus, "Not my will, but thine be done?" One says, "If I said that, I would have to close my store on the Sabbath." "If I said that, I could not accept Mrs. So and So's invitation to a card party." "If I said that I would have to pay my debts." "If I said that I would have to go home and burn up the prizes I have won at progressive euchre." "If I should say, 'Thy will be done,' I should have to throw the wine out of my cellar and break up my beer bottles. I am going to have a few bottles for dinner tonight." "I could not go to the ball game on Sunday afternoon if I said that." "I would have to stop lying about my neighbors if I said that." Oh, yes, it costs too much to say, "Thine be done." That is the reason you lose out. That's the reason you have moral curvature of the spine. That's the reason your spiritual batting average is not up to God's league standard.

"Not my will, but"—there's where you cash in. There's where you go into the ditch. There's where you turn off the light. There's where you hang up the receiver. There's where you ring off! There's where you puncture your tire. There's where you strike out. It costs too much to say, "Thine be done."

Down the Trail

THE preliminary bombardment has been finished and the drive against the forces of sin entrenched in New York is on. The aisles, thickly carpeted with clean pine shavings, odorous of the balsam of the woods, have become the sawdust trail pressed by the feet of returning backsliders, repentant sinners, and church members seeking deeper consecration. Thursday night, April 19, Mr. Sunday, after a sermon on Elijah, called for penitents to come forward and shake his hand. Two large delegations of Men's Bible Classes led the rush toward the evangelist. In all about 2,000 persons, said to be a record for the first nights of the Sunday meetings, grasped the hand of the evangelist and took seats in the sections which had been cleared for trail-hitters. Of these, 1,049 afterward signed cards, giving their names, addresses and church preferences. At the second call, on Friday night, between 1,000 and 1,200 people walked down the aisle, many of them being girls from delegations, captained by women connected with the extension department, which carries the message of the Sunday campaign to the employees of shops and laundries, and even to individual servants in private homes.

Saturday night, April 12, 1,030 hit the trail, and on Sunday afternoon, April 22, in response to the sermon printed on the opposite page, a sermon which was a clarion call to church members to come out from among them and be different, 1,814 persons crowded down the aisles to grasp Mr. Sunday's hand, most of them being evidently members of churches, although here and there was one who had responded to the cry for repentance.

The Sunday afternoon meeting was marked by the presence of a delegation of sixty men and women from Boston under the leadership of Allan C. Emory, who had been chairman of the campaign committee in Boston for the Sunday meetings. Mr. Emory said: "The Billy Sunday campaign was the best thing for Boston the city ever knew. It beat the Boston Tea Party or the Battle of Bunker Hill in the good it brought to the city. Hundreds of business men and down-and-outers came to Christ and are holding on. Hundreds have since joined the churches owing to the work of the campaign. Thousands of church members have been reconsecrated, and the work is still going on."

Sunday night Mr. Sunday preached especially to backsliders from the text, "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee and thy backslidings reprove thee." He appealed for a single standard of morality, saying, "Sin is sexless. What is wrong for a woman is wrong for a man. It makes no difference to God whether the sinner wears a plug hat or hairpins, a coat or a petticoat. The doctrine that there must be a fountain of purity for women and a hog-wallow for men crawled out of the pit of hell."

"You can't live wrong and die right. You have got to have more claim on heaven than the fact that your mother is there and your wife and children are going there."

Referring to the proposal for prohibition during the war, Mr. Sunday said in the afternoon, "The government ought to close every brewery and distillery as a war measure and save for food the grain used. The grain used in the liquor business would feed an army of 2,000,000 men. Used for liquor, it disqualifies them as soldiers, husbands, business men or anything. I want everybody here to pledge me they won't drink any of the stuff." The cheer that came back in answer to this request evidenced the sympathy of the audience as well as their intent.

At the close of the afternoon service on Sunday, after the trail-hitters had been shown to the sections reserved for them and the cards had been handed around to be signed, Mr. Sunday closed the meeting with this prayer:

"Jesus, put your arms around New York. Hug her to death, Lord. Give her such a grip of love that she'll jump with joy. Jesus, we're sure the angels in heaven won't be done shouting all afternoon and all night, and the devils in hell won't be done growling all afternoon and all night. The battlements of heaven are crowded with smiling faces beaming down upon the people of New York, but hell is frowning. The devil never did us any good. To think any man or woman would line up with the devil! To think men and women would rather live in a sewer than on a roof garden! Is New York going to heaven? Yes! Is she going to pray? Yes! Is she going to be sober? Yes!" Then he leaned over the edge of the platform and called: "Hear that, Devil?"

Patrick Henry McQuade, first trail-hitter, joined the church on Sunday morning, April 22.

On Friday night an old man and his daughter were the first to grasp the hand of the evangelist. Then came schoolboys, then young girls just entering the world of industry, then men and women of wealth and position and of none of either, all mingled together in a happy, cheerful crowd, anxious to grasp the hand of the man who had stirred their consciences and whose message had compelled them to this declaration of a new intent. Not all were light-hearted, however, for here and there a man's face bore the marks of deep emotion, and now and then a woman burst frankly into tears as she crowded forward. On Friday night Mr. Sunday preached upon "The Hour Is Come."

He said that if good preaching would have saved New York, New York would have been in heaven long ago; but New York needed something else, and he told of an infidel who had gone night after night to hear Charles D. Finney preach and who at last, coming home in tears, had said to his wife, "That man makes plain what other fellows preach."

This sermon by Mr. Sunday, in common with a number of others, was in part a defense of revivalism and an answer to those who maintain that revivals are undignified and emotional. He said: "Some preachers don't believe in revivals. Neither does the devil. The Pharisees didn't approve of the methods of Jesus Christ; they spat in his face. You don't agree with me, but the drunkards that have been made sober from the Atlantic to the Pacific, they agree. The kids that get enough to eat now, and are not beaten when papa comes home, they agree. Too much preaching nowadays is too pretty, too dainty. It doesn't kill. One reason sin triumphs is because it's treated like a cream puff, not like a rattlesnake. Prudery is no more a sign of religion than a wig is the sign of hair. Both cover a bald spot."

Mr. Sunday likened the apartment houses of New York to the pueblos of the cave-dwellers. He urged the people to "get acquainted with your neighbor; you might like him."

In his sermon on Elijah Mr. Sunday said: "Don't be in a hurry with God. Remember, it takes thirty days to hatch a turkey egg. The three years Elijah spent in the desert taught him how to put a prayer through to the throne of God in three minutes, something you can't learn in any theological seminary I ever heard of. God has plenty of the kind of fire he used at Carmel to pour down tonight on old New York. Let God's blessings fall."

In his sermon on Friday night Mr. Sunday addressed the devil as follows: "Aren't you satisfied that you have wrung enough tears out of human hearts to make another Atlantic Ocean? Don't you know that you have wrung enough blood out of human hearts to redden every wave of that ocean? Aren't you satisfied now that it is said that many of the hotels of this city couldn't go on but for the liquor they sell to women?" In this sermon Mr. Sunday said, "We get what we look for in this world. That is why the bee gets honey and the spider only poison. A preacher said to me once, 'Why don't you do as I do?' and I replied that if I did I would be as poor a preacher as he was. I told him to use his mannerisms in fighting for the Lord and I would use mine, and that if both of us did our best we could give the devil a run for his money." Mr. Sunday said that some persons joined the church only for what they could get out of it, and that their motive was no higher than that of the "yegg who cracked the safe." Speaking of his early efforts to preach a convincing sermon and of his mistaken idea that he had to use long words and flowery language, he said: "I used words, some of which were so long that they would make the jaws of a Greek professor squeak for a week, but I made no impression; so one day I said, 'God, I have got it doped out wrong,' and I loaded up my Gospel with rock salt, ipecac, cayenne, barbed wire, tabasco and ketchup, and the feathers have been falling ever since. I tell you, friends, you can't fight a skunk with cologne. A religious sensation is better than religious damnation." Mr. Sunday announced on April 22 that he would extend the services of his campaign a trifle on April 29, beginning on that Sunday his usual program of three sermons on Sunday. The afternoon and evening sermons at the tabernacle on April 29 were announced to be for men only and Mr. Sunday promised to preach at each service his sermon, "Chickens come home to roost."

An Incident

LEAVING the tabernacle after a sermon that had brought hundreds weeping down the sawdust trail, a representative of the Christian Herald was followed to the subway station by a well-dressed couple, who very evidently belonged to New York. The man was well tailored, well groomed, well manicured, and evidently well-satisfied with himself, but disturbed, just a little, about something. The woman was good looking, but her beauty was tinged with art, and the face was empty of any evidence of interest in things worth while. She also had been disturbed.

She threw her shoulders and stepped quickly. Stopping to await the train she shook herself, turned to her escort and snapped, "How do you suppose he gets so many people to come and hear that rot?" The man's reply was inaudible, but a slight flush crept across his temples.

The third party to this conversation wondered which of her pet sins Mr. Sunday had stepped on that night.

Questions and Answers

X. Y. Z., Marion, Ind. What should I do to be a Christian and be saved? To one who has never yet made the effort "to get right with God" and to accept Christ as a personal Saviour, this may appear to be a hard question; yet it is a very simple thing. If we were to answer in the Scriptural way, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," many might feel disappointed and would regard the answer as inadequate, although it is strictly true. The first step toward salvation is to realize that we are living in sin, and need a Saviour; the next is to confess our sin and lay hold on Christ as Lord and Saviour by believing on him in our own hearts. This is the turning-point, for this step once taken, with our face toward Christ and our back toward sin, we renounce sin in all its forms, and go forward in the light and strength which Christ imparts to us. Here some one may ask, "How shall we know that we have faith in Christ as a Saviour?" It is true that many souls take the first steps toward salvation in fear and trembling; all are not equally bold and confident; Christ is near, yet they doubt. But if they have in their hearts the sincere desire to forsake sin, and sincere repentance of their errors in the past, then they must feel that surely, as Christ died for sinners, he died for them. The moment any one stops doubting and begins to believe and throws himself on the divine mercy and forgiveness, he will find peace, and find that Christ is a real Saviour. But this is only the beginning, although it is a great beginning. To believe and to stop there becomes an impossibility; the man who believes must now be up and doing. When the Christ-Spirit enters the heart of a man, it inspires him to follow the Master's example, to cultivate his spirit, to emulate his life of purity and holiness and helpfulness; it draws a man to prayer and communion with God, and makes him feel at home in the society of Christian men and women, and in God's house; it inspires him to speak for Christ, to confess him before men, that others may be won to him also. Briefly, conviction of sin and conversion are followed by the works that are meet for repentance; not that these have any merit in themselves, but that they are rendered in loving acknowledgment of all that Christ has done and is doing for us. Faith is simply trust, and it is strengthened by constant use. Paul wrote that we walk by faith, not by sight, and Jesus himself commended those who had great faith. Through faith we obtain forgiveness of sins, justification, salvation, and all the other blessings that go to make up the Christian life. Such faith develops in the heart of the sincere believer a desire to accomplish all he can possibly do for others, that they may be led into the same happy condition.

E. M. C., Imperial, Kan. 1. No such passage in the Bible. 2. Write to Medical Record, New York, for the information.

H. H. Mallory, Andover, N. Y., would be grateful to any reader of this paper who could send him the address of Charles Saturly (or Satterlee), at one time a delivery wagon driver in New York City.

G. R., Calderwood, Mich. The word "sign" in Matt. 24 : 30 is used in the singular and refers to some appearance preceding the actual manifestation of Christ's second coming. Some have supposed this sign will be similar to the star of the Wise Men; others that it will be like a cross; again others, that it will have a luminous appearance visible to all, like the Shekinah of old. The sign will be but one of a number, all of which are foretold in this chapter and in Mark 13.

L. B., Quincy, Pa. 1. "Shew" is a different spelling of "show" and is pronounced the same. 2. President Lincoln was married only once—to Mary Todd, of Kentucky, who survived him.

H. S. F., La Grange, Ind. Please explain Phil. 4 : 8.

The apostle here lays down rules for the guidance of Christians, and with much emphasis of language urges on his hearers that they observe the various virtues that mark a Christian character. He directs them to live as he has taught them by word and example. As examples of such Christian virtues he cites truth in thoughts and actions; things that are honorable; justice to all men; unspotted and chaste living, loving things that win favor and bring friends. He urges them to follow after those things which are praiseworthy because they are virtuous, and intimates that praise is not in itself a virtue, but the appreciation which is a consequence of virtue.

T. F. D., Hazlehurst, Miss., writes, referring to a recent article in the Christian Herald on the "Women's Battle for Bread": "The real plan to help is to make a way by which needy families can help themselves. There is enough land in Mississippi to furnish homes for every needy family in New York City. Ten acres in this state will make enough to supply a family of six, with some to spare. I can furnish, any day, ten families homes from three to five rooms and land to work. I can find hundreds of others who can do the same; we have land and houses, but no tillers of the soil. I have lived in New York City myself, and I can say that this is as healthy a place as New York."

W. M., an aged friend in Maywood, Ill., writes: "I was very much interested in your article in the Herald of February 28, in reference to the final meeting of the unit band of men who were known as 'The 49ers.' I am a member of a club known as 'The Borrowed Time Club' and we meet in the First Presbyterian Church of Oak Park, Ill., every Wednesday. Total membership about 400, and we observe all our birthdays March 14. Principal reason for the club is to cheer and help each other. There are no dues. I read a great deal, and next to my Bible I love to get the Christian Herald every week." The Borrowed Time Club, we assume, is composed of people who have passed the 70th milestone in life, and who are now living beyond the period allotted in Scripture, which says: "The days of our years are threescore years and ten" (Ps. 90:10). These old friends have our hearty congratulations on their bright and cheerful attitude, which can only be explained on the ground of entire reliance on God's goodness and faith in salvation through Jesus Christ.

M. B., Morehouseville, N. Y., writes: "In thinking over the problem of the high cost of living, I have come to the conclusion that many people might do a large share toward lowering prices on vegetables. Many a family has a small garden which is usually devoted to flowers. If every one would make a change this season, it might help a little, perhaps a great deal."

E. H., Indianola, Ind. The statement quoted from the Declaration of Independence, that "all men are created equal," is explained by the words immediately following them: "that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights." They are equal only in certain fundamental rights, which no one can take from them, and which only they themselves can forfeit by attempting to violate the rights of others.

C. L. S., Reading, Pa. Kindly inform me who the nation now is that covers the Bible country of Gomer.

The descendants of Gomer (Gen. 10:2 and I Chron. 1:5) are believed by many scholars to have formed a great branch of the population of southeastern Europe. The Jerusalem Targum, however, renders Gen. 10:3 by "African." Another authority points to Phrygia as the land of Gomer, while still another indicates the German race. Some interpreters identify the Gomerites with Gamir, the ancient name for Cappadocia, and a few hold them to be the progenitors of the ancient Celtæ. The best authorities seem to agree that they settled somewhere north of the Black Sea and that they left traces of their presence in the ancient names Cimmerian, Bosphorus, the district of Cimmeria, the Cimmerian Walls, and the modern name Crimea. They seem to have settled later in Armenia.

M. E. K., McDonald, Kan. Please explain Luke 16:9.

Luther thought this passage was a caution against avarice. Farrar regarded it as an injunction to care and faithfulness. Taking account of the parable that precedes the passage—that of the unjust steward—it would seem that Christ was showing how a wicked man succeeded in getting friends at his master's expense. He would show that good men were not nearly so much in earnest in their godly affairs as were the worldly men in their business affairs. In other words, our Lord in this passage designed to show that even from worldly people, prudent and sagacious for their own selfish worldly ends, the children of light might learn a lesson, which they might apply to spiritual things.

Several Readers. We frequently receive letters from readers in different states, who wish to make a start in Christian work, the home or foreign missionary field preferred. We are always glad to be of service in such cases, wherever possible. It should be explained, however, that the missionary work of today is on a very different basis from that of twenty or thirty years ago. Now a missionary, in addition to spiritual zeal for the work, must have a certain amount of preparatory training. There are various institutes for this purpose, among them the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, the Baptist Institute in the same city, and several others, including the Christian and Missionary Alliance in New York. Prescribed courses are now recognized by practically all the religious denominations as necessary to the equipment of the beginner in mission work. It is well, therefore, for applicants for the mission field to first get in touch with their own denominational board and ascertain its standard of requirements for missionary beginners.

Mrs. W. H., Amboy, Wash., writes: "In your Mail-Bag for January 24 J. F. B., Tylerton, Md., asks about the bloom of the fig tree. The blossom is inside the fruit. If one tears open a ripe (not overripe) fig, the tiny little blossoms can be seen. The fig tree often bears three crops, if the first are killed by frost; and I've seen it bear a light fall crop."

H. H., Chambersburg, Pa., writes: "I first subscribed for the Christian Herald in October, 1878. I have received every number during these thirty-nine years, come next October. Have you an older subscriber on your list?" Has taught in Sunday school forty years; became a church member in 1858. This is a fine record! We wonder how many of our old subscribers have been as long identified with Christian work as our Chambersburg friend.

Reader, Venice Center, N. Y. Belief in the divinity of Jesus Christ is an essential of the Christian faith. There are, doubtless, many outside of the Christian Church who, while not accepting Jesus as divine, regard him as the greatest of all spiritual teachers and as divinely inspired. For all we have none but the kindliest feeling. We do not believe controversy helps in such cases.

M. R., Greensboro, Pa. "Hitting the sawdust trail," which has become a familiar expression since Evangelist Sunday himself first used it, is, to many sensitive minds, somewhat startling when heard for the first time. Your question, "Would it not seem very strange to read in God's Word that 3,000 swept down the sawdust trail to grasp Peter's hand?" emphasizes this view. But to those who are marching along the sawdust-covered aisle to the altar, to give themselves to Christ, the whole action is just as solemn and reverent as though it were described in classic terms, instead of in the vernacular. We are no apologist for slang, but if such an expression, by its very pungency, helps to energize a certain class of minds and set them in motion in the right direction, then it cannot be denied that, whatever its faults, it is doing good service.

This is the poem concerning which a letter was recently published in the Mail-Bag, requesting the name of the author. Rev. A. E. Bloom of Annandale, Minn., writes us that the author is given as "Rev. W. S. McKenzie, D. D., and the poem is set to music by Rev. F. M. Lamb.

In the crimson blush of morning,
  In the glitter of the noon,
In the midnight's gloomy darkness,
  Or the gleaming of the moon,
In the stillness of the twilight,
  As it shimmers in the sky,
We are watching, we are waiting,
  For the end that draweth nigh.

We shall see Him in his splendor,
  And amid a countless throng,
On the clouds to earth descending
  With a movement swift and strong;
And the angels round about Him,
  In their dazzling white array,
While before Him sounds the summons
  For the final judgment day.

And the trumpet's pealing clangor
  Will appalling terrors spread;
It will break the sleep of ages,
  And will rouse the sheeted dead;
Waxing loud and ever louder,
  It will pierce to every tomb;
It will call the saints to glory
  And the sinners to their doom.

He will welcome all His people,
  He will diadem His own;
He will show to them His glory,
  And will share with them His throne;
And forever in His presence
  They shall see Him face to face,
While they chant His matchless wisdom,
  And extol His wondrous grace.

He is coming, surely coming,
  For His promise cannot fail;
And the scoffers shall behold Him,
  And before Him they shall quail!
He is coming, quickly coming!
  But His coming we shall greet;
We have waited for His advent,
  And have listened for His feet.

Sofa Philosophy No. VIII

Woodpeckers and—Dynamite

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE Girl bent ruefully over her awakening rose-bush; for the tender young leaves were cut and punctured as if a particularly diabolical little army had bombarded their fresh greenness with miniature bullets.

"What a pity!" sighed the Girl. "What a—pity!"

The Boy, stooping swiftly, removed something short and wriggling and slimy—something colored a fresh green, very like the rose-leaves, from the thorny stem of the bush. He lifted it carefully between his thumb and forefinger.

"Here's the culprit," said the Boy.

The Girl, shuddering in a delicate way, moved nearer to view the small wriggling something that had worked havoc with her choicest blossoms.

"Why," she exclaimed, blank astonishment struggling with the surprise in her voice, "why—it's only a worm—a tiny little worm!"

The Boy laughed.

"Young lady," answered the Boy, "your perception does you credit. It is a worm. Also it's a tiny little worm. But it's a dangerous worm—to rose-bushes!"

The Girl still looked a bit puzzled.

"It doesn't seem possible, does it," she questioned, "that such a small thing could do so much damage. My plants are so large—so sturdy. And that"—she pointed a tragic, though smudged-with-the-dirt-of-gardening finger—"is so small and—silly."

THE Boy flicked the little green worm carelessly onto the lawn and turned away. The worm, so minute that it was unnoticeable, lay still—a bit of green completely dominated by the more spreading greenness of the grass. The little worm lay, too small to be detected. But the rose-bush, large and gracious, though stunted in its bloom, quivered, until all of its broken leaves danced a strange death-dance in the breeze.

"It's the small and silly things"—the Boy was half-laughing, half-serious—"that often do the most damage."

It was a late spring day—and rather warm. The Girl flung herself, wearily, on the grass.

"This gardening," she confided, "does tire one. . . . What were you saying?"

The Boy seated himself beside her, his hands clasped, poster-like, about his knees.

"It was just a few days ago," said the Boy, "that I read in a magazine of a murder. The victim was a millionaire—a man who amassed money by sheer force of character and wit. He was perhaps the cleverest man of his generation—the most brilliant man in his line of business. But he was murdered . . .

"They searched for the murderer—searched diligently as the trained greyhounds of the police department and secret service do search. But they didn't find the murderer, and they found only one clue—a small revolver lying near the scene of the crime—a revolver battered and old and worn and rusty—a revolver that was almost too ancient to be reliable. Any one could have bought a better gun in a Bowery pawnshop for two dollars." The Boy paused.

"But,"—the Girl dug her small, stained-with-gardening fingers into the soft earth. "But—"

"Don't you see?" The Boy's voice was earnest with the idea that he wanted to express. "Don't you see the connection? It's like the rose-bush and the worm. That man's life was worth millions—his brain was a master brain. But a little revolver, worth not more than two dollars, blotted him out—a small, silly revolver!"

"I see." The Girl looked thoughtfully out toward the horizon line. The sun, shining into her upturned face, touched it with a golden sort of a glory. "I see! But, somehow, I never thought of it that way."

THE Boy responded to the glow of interest. (Almost any boy will!) He expanded his theme.

"We're in war now," said the Boy, "aren't we? About the last of the really great countries to enter a—a world conflict. They're all fighting, over there in Europe—England, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Austria. . . . And why?" He paused, and——

"Why, indeed?" murmured the Girl.

The Boy spoke excitedly.

"Because," answered the Boy, "a half-crazed student, in a moment of madness, shot a man who happened to be an archduke. Because vast countries, perhaps waiting for just such a chance, took up the act—had words over it—fought. That's why.

"What happened to him—the student with the half-crazed brain? I don't know—you don't know . . . He's been lost sight of in the great, feverish rush of more thrilling events. Folk have just about forgotten his small, silly existence. And yet, small and silly though that life was, it has led millions of men to their death!"

OVER in one of the oak-trees a woodpecker beat an insistent tattoo against the bark.

"That woodpecker," remarked the Boy, "doesn't go very deeply into the wood with his beak, does he? And yet, if he kept on tapping in the same place, he could cut away a tree. Or if, instead of a branch, he should peck on a stick of dynamite—"

The Girl interrupted. Her voice sounded a bit indignant.

"Everything can be dangerous," she retorted; "everything in the whole world. The sun could burn me horribly if it came, reflected, through a small, silly magnifying glass. The wind could kill me if I were standing on the edge of a cliff, and it blew suddenly enough. I could be drowned in a small silly bowl of water if I held my face down in it. It wouldn't have to be very many inches deep. It could—"

"Help!" the Boy protested feebly. "I didn't mean to start—"

"Of course we all know that a lighted match dropped on some hay will set a barn on fire—a huge barn. But if we're careful the match won't get anywhere near the hay. It isn't necessary any more than it's necessary for a woodpecker to get near a stick of dynamite. It isn't necessary for a millionaire—if he's the right sort of a millionaire—to inspire a hate that would murder him in the dark with a two-dollar revolver. We can take care of our crazed students sanely . . . We can put bug-poison on our rose-bushes." The Girl stopped a moment for breath, then plunged on. "Most little things—even though they are small and silly—will do some damage if they come in contact with certain large things—" she finished—"the little worm and the large rose-bush; the cheap revolver and the clever man; the crazed boy and national prejudice—the woodpecker and the dynamite."

The Boy laughed.

"You," said the Boy, "though you are not silly, are small and harmless-looking. And—" the Boy rose to his complacent six feet of height. "I, though not important, am fairly well grown . . . And yet just seeing you"—the Boy's voice turned suddenly serious—"rather—well, mixes things up—here—" And, quite unconscious of dramatic effect, the Boy thumped the part of his chest where his heart might have been.

THE Girl, too, rose to her feet. Taking her garden smock between her hands, which were unromantically dirty with the dirt of digging in flower beds, she swept him a mocking courtesy.

"You know what I said"—she laughed—"and so I think I'll go in and dress for tea—while you go home. I don't like," she chuckled, "to be considered dangerous. And I hate being compared to a—worm!"

The Boy, alone in the garden, ruefully surveyed the battered rose-bush.

The Reason They Choose Goodyears

Few men of the vast number that buy Goodyear Tires have any uncertainty as to the reasons or causes for their selection.

For the most part, Goodyear users are prompted by purely personal interests—they buy the tire which to their mind gives them back the largest returns for the money they pay down.

That Goodyear Tires should be the ones that under such circumstances they should prefer, is not surprising.

Goodyear Tires are built from first to last to compel such a preference, by delivering the largest usefulness that it is possible to embody in such a tire.

The special Goodyear fabric, woven in the Goodyear mills at Killingly, Connecticut, which is far stronger than any like fabric hitherto known, was developed to this end.

The Goodyear structural features—the No-Hook bead, On-Air cure, the Braided Piano-Wire base, the All-Weather tread and like improvements—were evolved for the same reason.

And throughout the entire Goodyear institution a similar influence holds sway.

The Goodyear Tire you buy will agreeably prove to you the successful result accomplished.

It will deliver you the kind of service that has made it the largest selling brand in America.

Goodyear Tires, Heavy Tourist Tubes and "Tire Saver" Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

Hungering to Feed the Hungry

If all of the people on Manhattan Island were to be driven from their homes and marched 500 miles overland, then left to shift for themselves in a foreign and desolate country, what would we not do here in America to relieve the distress of these fellow countrymen, so terribly oppressed? Yet in Syria today more than 2,000,000 people, mostly women and children, approximately as many people as live on Manhattan Island, are destitute, homeless and helpless, except as they are relieved through the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief. And in Belgium other thousands are only kept from hunger and misery through the action of another American Committee, while in Poland and Galicia other committees such as the one organized by that patriotic Pole, Paderewski, as well as committees representing charitable organizations in other belligerent countries and the committees representing the Christian Herald, are daily feeding the flickering flame of life and hope in the breasts of those who know nothing of war except its terror.

In the two years and a half of war, the Christian Herald has had many evidences of the sacrifice of those whose gifts have made relief possible. Only the other day a check came to the treasurer of the relief fund from the treasurer of the Thomasville Baptist Orphanage at Thomasville, North Carolina. The letter read as follows: "We are a house of orphanage boys, thirty-four of us. We have very little money, but one of the boys suggested that we might go without a meal and send the price each month. So we are going without our supper tonight, and will send a check for one dollar, the price of our supper as estimated. We pray for the suffering people of Europe and that the war may cease."

That is real sacrifice, but it is only one instance of many cases in which members of the Christian Herald Family are sacrificing and denying themselves in order that their pledge to the Monthly Offering Club or their gift, which they want to make as large as possible, may go forward to the hands of those who represent all the givers upon the field.

The monthly offering clubs are ten in number and provide for gifts, monthly, of fifty cents, of one dollar, of two dollars, of three dollars, of five dollars, of ten dollars, of twenty dollars, of twenty-five dollars, of fifty dollars, and of some amount to be governed by circumstances.

Please address your gifts to the Christian Herald Relief Fund, Room 93, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State your preference as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

Jesus, the True Vine

International Sunday School Lesson for May 13. John 15 : 1-16

The Spirit of the Christian Life

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HERE we have a great allegory of the relationship of Christ and his disciples that grows in richness of meaning the longer we study it. He is the Vine, the Stock, the life-giving Source. We are the branches, the fruit-bearing, outreaching avenues by which the Vine manifests its life to the world. Vine and branches together constitute the great spiritual church throughout the ages. The branches come and go, the Vine is perennial. The church is constant yet ever-changing. The fruit is new and fresh and life-giving, to the building up of the Kingdom of God on earth.

The purpose of the exhortation is the development of the disciples themselves. God is described as the Husbandman, the Overseer, the Maker of Decisions, training the whole growth in the way he would have it go. He cuts back, for his own wise purpose; he uplifts and supports in time of weakness and need. Christ calls himself the main Stalk of the whole system, the Feeder drawing upon the supplies of God for the sake of the uttermost twig.

But the interest of the chapter centers in the branches, in Christian men and women, their activities, their successes or failures as mediators of Christ to the hungry world.

The Inner Secret of the Christian Life

No one can fathom the spirit of the Christian life who has not learned its inner secret in John 15 : 4, "Abide in me and I in you." Abiding in Christ is a great spiritual mystery that is very simple to those who enjoy the experience. But it is beyond the explanation of those who do not understand from a personal test.

For such there is something baffling and yet fascinating about a man like Paul with his "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me," and his confident assurance, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." It does one good to read of a modern knight of the Cross such as Chinese Gordon, who combined the best of saint and soldier, a difficult combination indeed! Gordon knew the secret of abiding in him whether facing fanatical Arabs in the Sudan or imparting "the joy that fadeth never" to the ragged young men of Gravesend. Don't fail to read up on Gordon.

A Unity of Purpose

Well, what can we put into words concerning this relationship of an understanding disciple with his Lord? This at least to begin with: It comes from a vital unity of life with Christ that is far more than any outward form or mechanical rite can accomplish. Vine and branch are not fastened together from without like brick and mortar. There is an inner principle flowing through both. So there is a power that moves through Paul and Jesus, through Jesus and Gordon, through Jesus and you and me, I trust.

This power is perhaps best described as a common purpose. In becoming Christ's disciple I have learned to desire what he desires, to work for the things he has planned. When I am most earnestly bent on the things he cared for I am most conscious of that inner strength. Paul lost all selfish purposes so completely that he was nearly always conscious of the Abiding Christ.

When the branch tries to live without the vine it soon withers. The selfish Christian soon drops off and ceases to bear fruit. There is no place for separateness. We must be one with him. His will, his purpose, must become ours.

Its Use of Affliction

The parable of the Vine throws rich light and meaning upon our trials. Affliction is the purging and pruning of the fruit-bearing branches. How cruel it seems to the uninitiated, the lopping off of great sprays of leaves, the cutting back in fall and again in springtime! My neighbor had never grown grapes before, and he could not bear to prune severely. In a couple of seasons he had nothing but leaves!

The best vines are most carefully restrained from wasting energy for merely temporary show of green. The best branches are purged that they may bear yet more abundantly.

Saints and Sufferers

Just so the greatest saints have had sorest trials. Paul had his thorn in the flesh besides all the outward distresses and persecutions. Bunyan in prison chains and rags gave the world the Pilgrim's Progress. Job was a far bigger and braver soul after his many afflictions. Perchance an easy way would have spoiled the three of them! The fruitful grape is the worst plant in the garden for running wild if you give it its own sweet will. It must submit to the will of the husbandman ere it bear rich fruit.

Even Jesus, "though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered." And like the well-pruned vine, the apparent waste of so great possibilities of human glory and power resulted in richer fruit of salvation to the whole world. What loss to the world, a poetic Greek might have said, if he had learned that the young author of the Beatitudes and the Prodigal Son had been crucified!

On Calvary a great gash was made in the True Vine that many branches might be grafted into his life-giving love. Except they also be cut loose from the wild and selfish streak in nature they could not be rooted deeply enough in him. It is a heartrending operation for some of us. But in the end it yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

Its Fruitfulness

For the object sought by the Gardener is fruit. We must be producers. We get in order to give. Our mission is to draw heavily on the inexhaustible supply of grace and to live a life rich in good works. Thoughts, words and actions like Christ's are what all the world needs. They are the fruit God seeks as he comes to us year by year.

There is no fruit without branches. God ministers through you. By our hands must Christ's little ones be led and fed. It is our feet that must go into the desert to bring back the lost sheep. Except we abide in him, he is handicapped. Without us he cannot do his will. Without him we can do nothing, for we are so weak, so changeable, so easily disheartened.

The whole creation is groaning and travailing even now for the revealing of the sons of God. Christ-filled men alone can save the world in this dark hour of violence and hate. We must bear much fruit in the next year or two if the Father is to be glorified. We must abide in Christ to know what he would have his disciples do.

By Their Fruits

Jesus is here just as practical as an American efficiency engineer. He says that the world is right in testing his followers by their ability to produce the goods. Those whose faith does not issue in results will sooner or later be cast out like a dead branch.

The test of a church is not the correctness of its creed or ritual. If it is making men and women Christlike, then it is a fruit-bearing section of the Vine. If it has lost its first love, like Ephesus, and is not doing the first works, Christ is likely to come and remove its candlestick out of its place (Rev. 2 : 5).

Similarly must the Bible school be tested. Not by large numbers and good organization alone. Not even by successful teaching of Bible history and names and dates. Still less, of course, by an aimless and haphazard piety. Its value is to be estimated by its success in imparting the spirit of Jesus to the young. Is it producing men and women in whom the religion of the Bible is reincarnated, disciples eagerly doing Jesus' work in Jesus' way?

Rulers and governments are in the crucible today. By their fruits will they also be judged. The weak, selfish, and worldly will all go the way of the feeble, timid, selfish Czardom in Russia. The brave, unselfish and fraternal will alone endure the tests of our time.

The New Commandment

The branch must submit to the law of the Vine, the Vine to the law of the Husbandman. Christ kept his Father's commandments. We must keep his commandments in order to achieve a vital, fructifying unity. There is no room for differences of policy and opinion between a vine and its bearing wood.

Here Jesus repeats once more the New Commandment of John 13 : 34, "That ye love one another, even as I have loved you." This goes far beyond the Golden Rule. "Do as you'd be done by" is fine. "Love as Jesus loved" is supreme. It is heavenly.

Note that the new commandment refers to the attitude of disciples to one another, not to outsiders primarily. The branches of the Vine have a vital relationship to one another. They are members of one family, nay rather of one body. Cooperation in fruit-bearing is indispensable. If Christians do not love one another, how can they really claim to love the world? If the members of a local church cannot compose their differences in the spirit of the Master, how can the great world's endless feuds and wars be quenched?

How many circles of believers manifest true discipleship to the world, according to Jesus' test: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another"?

An early Christian book, the Epistle to Diognetus, sets forth beautifully the Christian motive and spirit. It represents the heathen crowd as exclaiming, "Behold how these Christians love one another!" Can we elicit such testimony from outsiders today?

Presenting the Lesson

I. The younger class. Make sure they understand the metaphor; explain the growth and care of a vine, pruning, etc. The fruits of a Christian life: kind words, helpful deeds. Get the children to tell concrete examples. Life's discipline intended to increase the fruits. For example, a boy who has been in the hospital sends flowers there every spring, because he knows how a big bunch of daisies cheered him. A kinder, more thoughtful life. Loving, obeying, fruit-bearing give us the Joy of Jesus. (Verse 11.)

II. The Bible Class. Use today's outline: The Christian Life.

Its Inner Secret.
Its Use of Affliction.
Its Test—Fruitfulness.

Questions for Discussion

Can all our suffering and trouble be interpreted as purifying and spiritually quickening? Grapple with this old, old problem.

Can you name a great soul that never knew anguish of mind or body? (Washington, Lincoln.)

How does Jesus strengthen us? Let members try to state the experience for themselves. What does he do?

Men judged by fruits—not their race or color, not their culture or ignorance, not their wealth or poverty. What qualities of character and life count most?

Key Illustration for Superintendent's Review

A hot, dusty city street. No shade, no earth or grass, only concrete and brick to be seen. Suddenly one comes to a stone wall covered over with rich green vine. Branches and sprays innumerable and rich purple clusters of fruit. You know at once that beyond the wall is a strong root, an unseen garden, and abundant supplies of refreshing waters.

So in the midst of a heathen city the traveler finds a mission compound. Here are Christian teachers, Christian physicians ministering to the sick, unselfish friendship for the poor. You know that the branches of this fruitful vine run from across the sea. But the root is the unseen Christ of the Upper Room, who washed his disciples' feet, and who said, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you." Without him there would be nothing. But because there is much fruit God is glorified.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

New Sunday School Items for Missionary Sunday

FROM faraway Burma! "There are two kinds of Sunday schools in this land about which so little is known. The missionaries here started day schools for the uneducated children. The Buddhist parents are so eager to have their children educated that they send them to these mission schools, even though they may become Christians. In some cases the parents prevent their children from attending the Sunday school session of these day schools, telling them that 'hell will be the penalty for attendance upon Sunday school.' One schoolboy who had become a Christian at heart fell suddenly ill and died. His Buddhist mother told the missionary afterward how the boy called her and said, 'The angels have come for me. They are very near.'

"The other kind of Sunday schools are held in a Christian or Buddhist home or out in the open air, under the shade of a tree or in a house by the side of the street. The attendance runs from 40 to 100 children, with a fringe of adults listening. The names are not gathered in a roll, because if this were attempted the people would scatter, as they would suspect some method for a new form of taxation, or vaccination or inoculation. Not many are able to read. Many children have to carry baby brothers and sisters almost as big as themselves. They sing 'Jesus Loves Me,' 'In the Sweet By-and-by,' 'Silent Night.' It is really more noise than song. Picture-lesson rolls are used, and the postcards sent by American Sunday school children are made rewards for memorizing Scripture. These pictures you can see pasted up in homes all over these localities."

One such school has been going for nine years, and it has changed the whole community. The Burmese children have all manner of diseases, and the missionaries go to the homes and doctor them there. Scores of babies' lives are saved by simple remedies. Infant mortality in Burma runs up to forty per cent.

Through such loving Gospel ministry some day the children of these lands will come into their own.

Korean Men Eager for Bible Study

From January 4, 1917, the Men's United Bible Class held its annual session in Pyeng Yang; 675 men paid the enrolment fee of ten sen (5 cents) for the two weeks of Bible study; and in addition 138 students were enrolled in the Bible Institute, which began the same day and continued one month longer. Adding the 246 students from the regular college and academy curriculum, there were 1,059 men and boys in attendance.

A group of 150 men, who were especially interested in becoming better teachers, put in an additional hour each day in a normal class. These men expect to give from one to three weeks' time free teaching local Bible classes throughout the Pyeng Yang territory.

Here is a thing unmatched in America: Daybreak prayer meetings were held during the two weeks of this Bible conference, and six hundred men attended the first morning, when the thermometer registered ten degrees below zero. Even twenty-two degrees below didn't keep that multitude of earnest men in bed, for the prayer meetings kept increasing in size until, the last morning, we had fully nine hundred eager men in attendance at six A. M.

Young People's Topics for May 13

Epworth League Anniversary Service

MAY 13 will be observed by the Epworth Leagues all over the world as the anniversary of the League, which was founded in 1889. It is therefore about to celebrate its twenty-eighth anniversary. The League is said to be the largest denominational young people's society in the world. It has been a worthy member of the great fraternity of young people's societies. It has brought to the Methodist Church the strength of young manhood and young womanhood, and has furnished a happy way for the young people of the Sunday schools to grow logically into church membership, fitting them in the process to be the best sort of church members. Like the Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League, no matter what the number of its years, is ever young. For this anniversary day a program has been prepared in the form of a pageant, depicting the birth, growth and purposes of the Epworth League, beautifully and strikingly worked out. The pageant is simple and effective. Programs may be procured at two dollars per hundred from the Central Office of the League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Illinois.

The Fellowship of God (Quiet Hour)

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic
Ps. 119 : 97-104

FELLOWSHIP is closer than friendship; it is deeper than sympathy. If we have fellowship one with another, we live together the same life, think the same thoughts, suffer the same sorrows, and achieve together the same results. What pertains to one is the possession of the other; what is taken from one is the loss of the other; the inspiration of one is the joy of the other; the strength of one is the power of the other.

We who have gained sonship through the blood of Christ may experience complete fellowship with God, and may walk with him. We may have his conscious presence with us every step of our way, so that his mind will be in us and we will think his thoughts. This fellowship is, however, only to be ours when our love for God and our determination to do his will are absolute and complete. There can be no fellowship with God if any part of us loves anything other than God more than him. And if we have this fellowship we can say with the psalmist, "Oh how I love thy law." If we have not this fellowship, we will neither love God's law nor submit in patience to any other. The law of fellowship could not be better stated then in this Psalm. Wisdom comes through the commandments of God, understanding through meditation on its testimonies and through the keeping of his precepts; virtue through the keeping of the Word, and rectitude through the judgments of God taught by his Word. If this fellowship is ours, the Word of God will be sweet to our taste, honey in our mouth; and his precepts, bringing understanding, will bring hatred of every false and imperfect way.

The Bible and Business

By W. B. ASHLEY

IS the church dipping down into business these days, or is Business lifting up a hand to help the church, or have the two discovered that they are on the same plane in their relation to society?

In a small Western town a hard-working minister, who had never learned the art of lettering, felt this impact of business. He decided that what his church needed—and it certainly needed something—was a large poster advertisement. The painful process by which he arrived at the knowledge that if he wanted a large poster advertisement he would have to make it himself, we will not follow. We will just sit down and gleefully watch him refuse to give up. He starts to letter his large poster in rather a peculiar fashion. He gets a hammer and tacks. Then he gets a square of white cloth and tacks it up on the wall. Then he gets a magic lantern, with which some years before he had hoped to save the souls of his town, and busily feeds into it slides which he has made by cutting capital letters and small letters out of a newspaper and pasting them on the bits of glass. Letter by letter he throws these upon the screen to spell out, in the position where he wants them, the words of his large poster advertisement. And as each letter is thrown on the screen he draws it in with crayon.

It takes him quite a while in the midst of his pastoral duties to complete his bulletin board, and we can scarcely sit through the making of the entire advertisement. Suffice it to say that he completed it, and it was the hardest piece of work he had ever done in his life. But the happy sequel is that he has not had to work hard since. His labor was abundantly rewarded by the attendance the bulletin board drew to his church, and with that as a beginning this far Western small-town minister has found that advertising can get people to church just as surely as it can get them to a moving picture show.

THERE are some pious people who do not even yet believe that instrumental music is proper in church. It annoys them dreadfu'ly during the service to see the organ, and when its tones lead the singing they tremble with indignation. They remember that their first organist was unfortunately addicted to drink, and they secretly believe that the present organist, who is a lady, smokes cigarettes in private. That anything sacred can be connected with instrumental music in the church they cannot believe.

A great many people are going to view the advent of advertising in the church in just that spirit. They have slowly yielded place for an auditing committee, for duplex envelopes, and for two or three other businesslike ways of doing things. But advertising? Never.

A Lutheran church in Philadelphia was browbeaten by its young pastor into allowing him an advertising appropriation in the annual budget. This was for 1914. The evening collections in that church for 1913 amounted to $81. Fully 70 per cent of the seats were not being worn out those evenings. They are being worn out fast now. In 1916 the evening collections amounted to $1,373, so possibly when they do wear out, new ones can be afforded. Despite the probable withdrawal from the congregation of a few who could not stand such sacrilege, the membership has grown greatly, and the influence of the church through multiplied activities is immeasurably greater than it was. And furthermore, the churches of Philadelphia as a whole have formed a Church Advertising Association and are making a regular feature of advertising. If the churches of Philadelphia, the city of brotherly love, believe that business is a proper ally of the church, other cities and towns may at least consider the subject.

And they are doing so. It is one of the notable movements of the day, the adoption of advertising by churches. Justification (other than the argument of successful results, which in itself might seem conclusive) is largely taken from the Bible. "Wist ye not," the Saviour asked of those who, under his guidance, were to be the founders of his Church, "wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Now if work is not business, what is it? And in committing the Father's business to his followers for all time, he promised them that they would do greater work than he did. In other words, the business would grow. There really seems to be something in this when you come to think it over.

AND again: "Ye (the Church of Christ) are the light of the world. . . . . Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Well, who is to prove that advertising was not in the Master's mind? How else in this day will the good works of the church be made known before men so that they may glorify their Father in heaven?

The churches are taking up the idea of advertising with avidity, or, to express it in Bible language, with zeal, but not according to knowledge. And right here lies one serious danger; for advertising cannot be done by inspiration. Advertising is the master secret of success in the building up of great industries. As respects one hundred, and one thousand, things that have contributed to comfort and health, advertising has been and still is one of the greatest forces of civilization. All the money that has been spent in advertising, and billions have been so spent, is a bagatelle in comparison with the advance the human race has made in right living as a consequence. And the churches cannot expect to use this tremendous force by instinct. A peanut stand is a business, and a hand-bill announcing a church fair is an advertisement. That is as near as you can come to calling what many churches attempt, advertising. And in deciding to use in behalf of the greatest business on earth the master secret of success, the churches assuredly must look to the masters of that secret for guidance.

All of which is by way of calling attention to the creation, within the Associated Advertising Clubs of the world, of a department devoted to Church Advertising. Reference was made in the Christian Herald at the time to the formation of this new body of advertisers. Some two or three hundred ministers whose churches are prosperous through advertising, and a large number of most experienced advertising men, members in every case of one or another church, assembled in Philadelphia last June in connection with the convention of the Associated Clubs, and for three days hammered away at this subject. They approached it from every angle, and the enthusiasm was contagious. In fact, the sessions of the Church Advertising Department were pronounced the livest of the whole convention, and there were fifteen other departments in session at the convention. It was then that the Church Advertising and Publicity Department was organized, and Rev. Christian F. Reisner of New York, who has long been seeking to get the churches to consider advertising, was made the president. A member at the time of the editorial staff of the Christian Herald, W. B. Ashley, was selected as the executive secretary. The Lutheran minister above referred to, Rev. Daniel E. Weigle, was made the official secretary. The other officers and a strong Executive Committee include many eminent ministers and business men who have greatly succeeded in commercial advertising. Upwards of one hundred ministers and laymen, representative of all creeds, have consented to the use of their names as firm believers in advertising for the church when it is employed the right way.

THE new organization is looking not only to assisting churches in individual advertising, but particularly

"Limpy"

"The Boy Who Felt Neglected"

By WILLIAM JOHNSTON

What William Johnston has done in this story is to put on paper the soul of a boy of ten, who is just coming face to face with the truer values of life. No mean achievement is this, for it is a beautiful thing to look into the heart of a child and see what is hidden there.

This book has just been published and is making a big hit. A copy was sent to the Secretary of the Christian Herald and he became so interested in it that he sat up half the night reading it. If possible, it interested him more than Pollyanna. In his opinion, it is one of the most human stories that has been written in years.

IRVIN S. COBB says:

"Somebody might have written a truer, sweeter, more appealing, more convincing story of a boy than 'Limpy,' but nobody ever has."

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX says:

"'Limpy' is very beautiful and tender and ought to have a real success. It stirs the very best in its readers."

ELLIS PARKER BUTLER says:

"The story of 'Limpy' is so simply told that it seems almost too true to be fiction."

IRVING BATCHELLER says:

"We are in love with 'Limpy.' It is the kind of book that deserves great success."

CAROLYN WELLS says:

"If ever a story possessed that peculiar element, 'heart-kick'—it is 'Limpy.'"

New Hudson Speedster

With Super-Six Motor—Seating Four

Here is the smartest Speedster you have ever seen. Also the best performer.

We shall not build many. There is too much demand for our regular models. But Hudson dealers in large centers have them. And any Hudson dealer can get them while they last.

We are anxious to scatter our output, and among the right owners. For this model seems to typify the Hudson Super-Six.

Looks the Super-Car

This Hudson Speedster is finished in Cobalt blue, with vermilion wheels. The body edges are beveled, and finished in black.

The body is low and comfortable, and suggestive of a speedster. The steering wheel is at a rakish angle. There are seats for four.

It is for men who want something distinctive—a car that stands out—in this type. The men who get them will have the raciest cars on the road.

The Record-Breaker

The Super-Six motor, used in this Speedster, holds all the worth-while records. That is, the stock-car records for speed, for endurance, for quick pick-up and for hill-climbing.

This stock motor in a touring car—under A. A. A. supervision—has maintained a speed exceeding 75 miles per hour for 100 miles.

This stock motor in a stock chassis has attained a speed of 102.53 miles per hour.

It has made 1819 miles in 24 hours, breaking the record by 52 per cent.

It has twice broken the ocean-to-ocean record, in one continuous 7000-mile round trip. And a special Super-Six, in the world's greatest hill climb, made the best time against twenty special cars up Pike's Peak.

For All Lovers of a Matchless Car

But the Hudson Super-Six, in its various styles, appeals to more than speed lovers. It appeals to all who admire supremacy. And to all who want endurance.

In all the accepted tests for stock cars, it has proved itself the greatest car that's built.

And all this performance is due to super-endurance. All due to the fact that this invention has reduced motor friction to almost nil. It has nearly doubled endurance, and added 80 per cent to our motor's efficiency.

It has given to Hudson the top place among fine cars. Last year, no car above $1100 equaled it in sales.

All our body styles are designed and finished and equipped to make the Hudson look the leader that it is.

Have you seen our latest bodies?

to getting churches in every community to combine for mutual advantage in advertising, and also to lead the denominations of the church as a whole into national advertising, of the go-to-church and kindred ideas. The organization undertakes its important work in confidence of financial support from Christian men everywhere who believe that if advertising rightly done can advance the Kingdom of God among men, it should be adopted without delay. Through this organization the churches will receive expert advice and guidance, and in a multitude of ways the advantages of advertising will be made plain. The second convention of the department will take place in connection with the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs in St. Louis from June 3 to 7 inclusive, and on the afternoons of Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 4, 5 and 6, sessions that promise to far outdo the enthusiastic meetings in Philadelphia will be held. Ministers from everywhere are invited to attend this convention, and the registration fee, which is usually $2.50, will be only $1 in the case of ministers.

[The Christian Herald fully believes in this work, and the organization that has undertaken it, and will gladly receive and forward to the executive officers any communication from readers either seeking information or offering cooperation and support.]

Nation-Wide Evangelism

THE churches of America are this year placing a new and deeper emphasis on evangelism. From every quarter of the nation comes the call for workers. The evangelists are busy and their work is meeting with unusual success. While the eyes of the country are now focused upon the Sunday campaign in New York we would not forget the other campaigns that are turning men and women to Christ.

The churches of Ephrata, Pa., have experienced a genuine revival under the leadership of the O. E. Williams party. There were about six hundred decisions, church members confessed and forsook their worldliness, and the entire community was aroused. Thorough work will be done by the laymen's organization for following up the campaign.

The pastors of Meridian, N. Y., speak most favorably of the meetings held recently by the Pugsley-Peters party, and there will be many additions to the churches.

Robert E. Johnson and party closed a successful tabernacle meeting at Jasonville, Ind. There were over five hundred decisions.

The local paper of Tahlequah, Okla., speaks very favorably of the union meetings conducted by W. A. Erwin and S. G. Fraser. These workers are now in Chelsea, Okla.

The W. W. Hall party conducted a successful campaign in Donora, Pa., and from there they went to Monessen, and are now in Akron, O. In Donora 1,100 conversions are reported.

The Westfield, N. Y., papers have been giving much space to the excellent meetings held in that city by Chas. R. Drum.

Chas. H. Gray reports successful work in Oklahoma, and other fields are opening for his service.

The Mapleton, Minn., paper publishes a report of a special sermon on "The Home," by Harold F. Sayles, and says that his evangelistic services have been well attended and successful.

The P. C. Nelson campaign in Canton, S. Dak., aroused so much interest that the party was persuaded to stay an additional week. The publishing of a special daily paper was a great help.

Two thousand people of Rahway, N. J., bade goodbye to Evangelist Chas. F. Weigle and party when they left at the conclusion of the six weeks' campaign in that city. One thousand seven hundred and thirty people came forward in the meetings, and the entire community was revived. This campaign was followed by a short conservation work in Berwyn, Ill., and that by a union meeting in Mandan, N. Dak.

The Grand Haven, Mich., campaign, by the W. S. Colegrove party, closed with enthusiasm, and the workers received a great ovation. About five hundred confessed Christ, and every church has been greatly benefited. The party is now in Plainwell, Mich.

The George T. Stephens party reports a successful campaign in Keyser, W. Va. The local paper speaks of the revival of the churches, and the betterment of the community. The party is now in Cumberland, Md.

After a careful consideration, the ministers of Homer, N. Y., invited Harold L. Stephens and his party to conduct a brief evangelistic campaign in that city, and the local paper speaks favorably of results. The party is now in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario.

The closing meeting of the Oscar Lowry campaign in Sterling, Ill., was intended as a meeting for the new converts, but it turned out to be one of the most fruitful meetings of the revival, for 76 people, most of them between the ages of sixteen and twenty-five, went forward to accept Christ, and the interest was so great that there were many expressions of regret because the campaign was closing so soon. There were 798 conversions, and many reconsecrations, and a great awakening of the churches. The local paper says it was one of the most successful meetings ever held in the state. The party is now in Sapulpa, Okla.

Bob Jones reports that at the union tabernacle meetings in Zanesville, O., many nights hundreds were turned away. Following Zanesville, the party went to Grand Rapids, Mich.

Miss Sara C. Palmer and party conducted a successful campaign in Richmond, L. I. There were many conversions besides the quickening of the entire church membership.

E. H. Osborn has held successful meetings in Idaho and eastern Washington, two of his recent campaigns being in Auger Falls and Jerome.

Junction City, Kans., has just had the greatest revival in its history under the leadership of Evangelists Burke and Hobbs. There have been many additions to the churches.

Evangelist J. C. Ludgate closed a successful meeting at Bluffton, Ohio. Twenty college students volunteered for missionary work, and scores were converted and several hundred reconsecrated their lives to Christ.

Evangelist Frank A. Miller held meetings in Point Place Union Church, Toledo, Ohio, where there were some remarkable conversions of young and old, and a number of additions to the churches.

Evangelist E. J. Forsythe and party conducted a union campaign in Brazil, Ind., followed by a week of meetings in the churches. Hundreds of conversions are reported and many reconsecrations.

Evangelist R. W. Lewis has assumed charge of a Flying Squadron of three workers to visit every Presbyterian congregation in Mississippi with a view to revival work. In twelve community meetings there were 473 definite decisions.

Evangelist W. C. Mealing reports that in two church meetings in Harrisburg, Pa., there were nearly three hundred conversions, and that now he is in Enola, Pa., in a union meeting with five churches.

Bridgeport, Ky., has experienced the greatest revival of its history, and Dr. Rees, the leader, expresses himself as being greatly pleased with the results. The meetings were held in a casino seating 2,500.

Evangelist Thos. Houston reports that 31 joined the church as a result of two weeks of revival meetings in the Presbyterian Church, Brownsville, Pa., and 20 in Nicholson, Pa.

The Claude A. Gunder evangelistic party recently held a union campaign

JUST DAVID By Eleanor H. Porter Author of "Pollyanna"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one yearly subscription accompanied by $2.00.

Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.50.

in Whiting, Ind., which was very successful, although the work was hindered by difficult local conditions. Early in April the party was in Plymouth, Ind.

A feature of a six weeks' campaign conducted at Phœnix, Ariz., by Evangelists Hart and Magann was an extension trip made with thirty-five automobiles, which in one day covered 100 miles, reached all the towns near Phœnix and resulted in many conversions. A decided impression was made on the religious life of the city.

Evangelist Robert L. Layfield, of Kansas City, Kan., has been holding meetings in Highland Park Church, Minneapolis, Minn. There have been many decisions.

Evangelist A. J. Fitt writes: "We have just closed a good meeting in Odell, Neb. About forty have been converted and joined the church. Among the converts have been some of the leading men of the community."

Dayton, Ohio, has had the inspiration and blessing of two tabernacle meetings, conducted practically simultaneously; a group of churches in the East End uniting under the leadership of H. W. Bromley, and another group in the North End under the leadership of Dr. I. E. Honeywell.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

LAST winter the ground was frozen deep and millions of tiny bulbs were held fast in the rigid earth, yet every bulb was full of determination to grow, each one guarding a latent spark of life. These bulbs might easily have prayed the old prayer of the ages, "O, Lord, how long?" They might have chafed against the imprisoning walls of ice and have worn themselves out with complainings at the lateness of the spring. But each little bulb just lay quiet and rested, knowing full well that in the Father's good time the warmth of spring would come and it would find its opportunity. Now the hillsides are beginning to purple with violets and hepaticas, and spring beauties are pushing aside the faded leaves of the year that has gone, announcing another year of life and happiness and sunshine. These blossoms are eloquent of the faith that simply trusts and is content.

S. E. B. thanks God that two grandchildren, for whom prayers were asked, have "stood up for Jesus."

A. P. testifies to answered prayer in improvement of sight, and asks the prayers of God's people for her sister, a widow unable to work, that she may be able to sell her home in order to defray the expense of an operation.

M. T. M. acknowledges direct answer to prayer in the reversal by a higher court of an unjust judgment, and requests prayers for bodily healing and spiritual blessing for herself and two daughters.

S. T. K. praises God that her brother, who had become suddenly blind from what the doctors called paralysis of the optic nerve, and in answer to his own prayers and those of his family received his sight, is now preaching the Gospel.

Mrs. W. O. T. praises God for her own improved health and the restoration of hearing to a young man who had been deaf eight months from an electric shock. The physicians had pronounced the case incurable. She furthermore asks the prayers of all Christians for the conversion and bodily healing of her son-in-law. She also requests prayers for two friends, Mrs. B. and Mrs. C., who are suffering from cancer, and adds, "I have just finished reading 'The Miracle of Answered Prayer.' It is grand. I feel a deeper desire to do this blessed work for the Master. Please pray that I may be able to work for him with unwavering faith."

J. E. H. acknowledges answer to prayer for a daughter-in-law, who was sick, and a son, who was unconverted. The health of one is restored, and the other has given his heart to God and joined the church. The Prayer League is earnestly entreated to pray for another son, who has not yet accepted Christ, and asks the prayers of the League for a restoration of hearing for the purpose of doing more efficient service in the Master's vineyard.

H. P. L. writes of a successful revival meeting in a town in Michigan for which prayer was asked.

Mrs. D. W. B. testifies to a complete cure through prayer of her daughter, who had been pronounced hopelessly insane by a great specialist.

C. D. A. praises God for the saving of his wife from the morphine habit, from which she has been free since last July.

Mrs. N. W. W. reports her restoration to health without two operations which physicians had said were necessary. After suffering for twenty years, she is now getting well, and is perfectly happy, thanking God every day for his salvation. She asks prayer for a brother and sister who, with a family of five children, have become careless, have forgotten God and are discouraged at sufferings and misfortunes.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Mackey, Ky.; Norwood, N. C.; Cottonville, N. C.; Wanchese, N. C.; Tagus, N. D.; Carthage, Tenn.; Tallma, Mich. (at the Sanbal schoolhouse); Front Royal, Va. ("that many may be saved during revival at the Baptist church here"); Dora, Ala. (at the Baptist church); South Carver, Mass. (at the M. E. church); Sinton, Texas (that many may be saved during revival); Hutchinson, Kan. ("that the members of Irwin Memorial Church may have a deeper work of grace in their hearts"); Waco, Texas (that Texas may go dry); Edgerton, Mo. (pray for a dry town).

Mrs. A. B. B., "that a minister may be sent to our church."

Eighteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; ten wives, their husbands, including Mrs. M. E. A., "that husband may be saved and reconciled to me"; forty-five, other relatives or friends.

Nine readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Sixty-three ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. M. E. P., that three sisters may be restored to health; Mrs. J. B. P., W. B. M., and D. N. D. ask prayer that ministers may be restored to health and strength; another, S. J. C., that mother-in-law may be cured of cancer of the nose; another, Mrs. F. N., that husband may be spared from an incurable disease that threatens him; forty-three friends ask for healing for themselves, including A. S. R., who asks prayer for restoration of right arm; another, S. J. C., that health may be restored without an operation.

Sixteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Twenty-six friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desired and needs, including Mrs. A. O. T., that an abundance of rain may be sent all over Texas; another, that peace may come all over the world.

Mrs. M. C. R. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; a Believer, that father's mind may be restored; Mrs. E. S. N., that children's minds may be restored; eleven friends, for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves, friends or relatives.

M. E. W. and Mrs. V. L. ask prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. H. M. T. that son's sight may be restored.

M. D. M. and J. E. H. ask prayer that their hearing may be restored; L. L. H., that husband's hearing may be restored; G. B., that friend's hearing may be restored.

Thirty friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Two wives ask prayer that their husbands may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. L. M. H., that sons may be cured of the cider habit; eight friends ask prayer that relatives and friends may be cured of the liquor habit.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A. L. B., Providence, R. I.; Mrs. L. A. C., Naugatuck, Conn.; Mrs. J. B. P., Albany, Texas; Mrs. E. T. S., Cincinnati, Ohio; Mrs. J. T. G., Brooten, Minn.; F. D., Marion, N. Y.; M. J. M. Green, Kan.; Mrs. E. M., San José, Calif.; Mrs. F. B. L., Detroit, Mich.; A Reader, Parkton, Md.; A Subscriber, Fidelity, Ill.; R. E. D., Fort Worth, Texas; Mrs. I. At any rate, we were left with a few fine flags on hand, but now is the time when every good American should be able to display "Old Glory."

The illustration is an exact photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. It is made by the Dunkards, of Pennsylvania. To insure durability, the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent, bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. The pole is NOT included.

SPECIAL OFFER

We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal), all for $3.00.

John Goode Doing Good Work

DURING the last two months John Goode, whose remarkable life story was recently published in the Christian Herald, has related his experience to large and deeply interested audiences in many churches in different states. In several places he has spoken at more than one service, and, besides addressing church congregations, he has responded to invitations from missions, Sunday schools, brotherhoods and men's meetings. In a number of places the attendance in some of the churches was the largest ever known in these buildings. His Gospel tour includes the States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. On every occasion he was most cordially received, and the audiences were sympathetic and responsive. At one of the meetings he spoke to an audience of 750 in the town hall, by special arrangement.

Evidences were not wanting at many of these gatherings, showing that the wonderful story of John Goode's transformation by divine grace fell like good Gospel seed upon hearts that were ready to receive it. Told in his own quiet, simple way, it is an experience that never fails to kindle an audience to sympathy, and many a man after the meeting has grasped the speaker's hand and thanked him for having brought a new light and nobler purpose into his lite.

Mr. Goode relates this experience in connection with one of his services in a New Jersey city within twenty miles of New York:

"After the meeting one of the congregation told me that a young girl, who had attracted my attention by her lovely contralto voice, wanted to speak with me. When I went to her she told me she wanted my assistance in locating her father, who was living in a Bowery lodging-house. She gave me the name of a well-known house of the cheapest type, and said that perhaps the day or night clerk might know where her father could be found. Two or three days afterward I went to see the clerk and asked him if he knew a man by that name. He said he did, but he was not a lodger in the house, although he called there frequently. I left a message, asking him to call and see me at the noon-day prayer meeting in the Bowery Mission.

"Several days later he called. In my talk I told him how anxious his little girl was to help her father and to do everything she could to get him to try and be a good, strong man again. A meeting was arranged; on a certain night she was to come over and meet her father in the Mission, and they were to have a heart-to-heart talk together. It was a memorable night. After the meeting the choir and members and their pastor went down to the breakfast room, and sang to the men of the Bread Line while the poor wanderers were having their coffee and bread. It touched profoundly all who witnessed it, to see the little girl run over and kiss her father between the iron gratings that separated the aisle and breakfast-room, as the men came down to their meal. It made an impression upon the hearts of the Mission workers that will never be effaced—a tender, loving little girl leading her father back through the force of her faith and love.

"That father was at the Mission services the next week, well dressed and happy-looking, sitting on the platform, while his dear little daughter was singing for the men of the Bowery with a face that radiated God's own spirit of the Eastertide. To me it was an illustration of the sacred truth that 'love never faileth.' God's love, working through the heart of a child, had won the father back from sin and suffering—won both soul and body, for he is leading a Christian life today."

Pastors of churches within 100 miles of New York who desire to have John Goode speak to their congregations can address him in care of the Christian Herald. Dates will be arranged by mail.

For a few days the country seemed stunned by the tragedy. The army and reactionary element seized the power in most of the states. Abram Gonzalez, governor of Chihuahua, and my best friend in Mexico, was arrested and placed on a train bound for Mexico City. A few miles out from the state capital, his hands and feet were tied with ropes and he was thrown under the wheels of the moving train. Abram Gonzalez was a true patriot and a friend of the people. He was a graduate of the Christian Brothers College in St. Louis, and had practiced law in the United States.

Then came news of a counter-revolt against Huerta the usurper. Venustiano Carranza, governor of Coahuila, had taken the field against him. In Sonora Lieutenant-Colonel Alvaro Obregon had revolted with the garrison of Agua Prieta. Other leaders also took the field in many states. In Morelos Emiliano Zapata was already fighting the soldiers of Huerta.

Pancho Villa saw that there was work to do. He had no money to buy guns or horses, but an Italian who knew him came to the rescue with a loan of $500. Villa gathered together some of his former followers, most of them men who had been his comrades in his freebooter days, and rode across the Rio Grande near the El Paso smelter. In this little expedition were nine men, eight horses, ten rifles and a pack mule. The commissary consisted of two sacks of flour, three kilos of beans, and a ten-pound can of lard.

For a time Villa disappeared into the desert, sending out runners to his former captains. His mountaineer friends flocked to him, and soon he was again on the warpath. Moving like a whirlwind through the western and southern districts of Chihuahua, he captured town after town, only to abandon them as soon as he had confiscated supplies and money from the wealthy inhabitants. This is another secret of Villa's popularity. He forced the rich to pay, but lifted the burden of taxation from the poor in the districts he controlled.

At this time I was with the Yaqui Indians under General Obregon, in Sonora, and did not see Villa again until he was master of the state of Chihuahua. Finally he captured the mining town of Parral, where he found rich pickings, and a short time later staggered the federals by capturing Torreon, the most important railroad center of northern Mexico.

After replenishing his treasury he again disappeared in the desert without attempting to combat the Huerta troops which were hurrying to attack him. It is a fact that at this stage of the insurrection Villa armed and equipped his soldiers almost exclusively with munitions captured from the enemy.

For weeks Villa disappeared and no news was received of his movements. This is one of the reasons for his success—his driving energy and the remarkable mobility of his forces.

To be concluded next week

Among the Workers

RECENTLY there was held at the Ohio State University, Columbus, a Country Life Conference. About 250 men and women were in attendance, one-third being ministers. The report of the Ohio Survey showed that a majority of the rural churches in the state, serving a population of 1,750,000, are barely holding their own or are slowly dying. There are 6,000 of these churches, or one to every unit of 286 people. Meigsville Township is typical of many townships. It has nine churches for 846 people. None of these churches has a resident pastor. Nearly two-thirds of the 6,000 churches have no resident pastors. More than 5,000 are without the undivided services of a minister. More than 3,300 have one-third or less of a minister's service. Seven hundred have no minister at all. The question of federation was discussed and many of those present spoke in favor of a plan for "getting together" for the good of the Kingdom.

you like it that I like him? I thought you wanted me to like your friends."

"Yes, yes, I know; and I do, Helen, of course." Burke got to his feet and took a nervous turn about the tiny room.

Helen watched him with widening eyes. The look of indolent satisfaction was gone from her face. She was not yawning now.

"Why, Burke, what is the matter?" she catechized. "Wasn't I nice to him? Didn't I talk to him, and just lay myself out to entertain him? Didn't I ask him to dinner, and——"

"Dinner!" Burke fairly snarled the word out as he wheeled sharply. "Helen! I wonder if you think I'd have that man come here to dinner, or come here ever again to hear you— Oh, hang it all, what am I saying?" he broke off, jerking himself about with a despairing gesture.

Helen came now to her feet. Her eyes blazed.

"I know. You was ashamed of me," she panted.

"Oh, come, come; nonsense, Helen!"

"You was."

"Of course I wasn't."

"Then what was the matter?"

"Nothing; nothing, Helen."

"There was, too. Don't you suppose I know? But I tried to do all right. I tried to make you p-proud of me," she choked. "I know I didn't talk much at first. I was scared and stupid, he was so fine and grand. And I didn't know a thing about all that Egyptian stuff you was talking about. Then I thought how 'shamed you'd be of me, and I just made up my mind I would talk and show him it wasn't a—a little fool that you'd married; and I s'posed I was doing what you wanted me to. But I see now I wasn't. I wasn't fine enough for your grand friend. I ain't never fine enough for 'em. But I don't care. I hate 'em all—every one of 'em! I'd rather have Mrs. Jones twice over. She isn't ashamed of me. I thought I was p-pleasing you; and now—now—" Her words were lost in a storm of sobs.

There was but one thing to be done, of course; and Burke did it. He took her in his arms and soothed and petted and praised her. What he said he did not know—nor care, for that matter, so long as it served ever so slightly to dam the flood of Helen's tears. That, for the moment, was the only thing worth living for. The storm passed at last, as storms must; but it was still a teary little wife that received her husband's good-night kiss some time later.

Burke did not go to sleep very readily that night. In his mind he was going over his prospective meeting with his friend Gleason the next day.

What would Gleason say? How would he act? What would he himself say? What could he say? He could not very well apologize for——

Even to himself Burke would not finish the sentence.

Apologize? Indeed, no! As if there were anything, anyway, to apologize for! He would meet Gleason exactly as usual. He would carry his head high. There should be about him no air of apology or appeal. By his every act and word he would show that he was not in need of sympathy, and that he should resent comment. He might even ask Gleason to dinner. He believed he would ask him to dinner. In no other way, certainly, could he so convincingly show how—er—proud he was of his wife.

Burke went to sleep then.

It had been arranged that the two men should meet at noon for luncheon; and promptly on time Burke appeared at the hotel. His chin was indeed high, and for the first two minutes he was painfully guarded and self-conscious in his bearing. But under the unstudied naturalness of the doctor's manner, he speedily became his normal self; and in five minutes the two were conversing with their old ease and enthusiasm.

The doctor had with him an Egyptian scarab with a rarely interesting inscription, a new acquisition; also a tiny Babylonian tablet of great value. In both of them Burke was much interested. In the wake, then, of a five-thousand-year-old stylus, it is not strange that he forgot present problems.

"I'm taking these up tonight for your father to see," smiled the doctor, after a short silence. "He writes me he's got a new tablet himself; a very old one. He thinks he's made a discovery on it, too. He swears he's picked out a veritable thumb-mark on one side."

"Nonsense! Dad's always discovering things," grinned Burke. "You know dad."

"But he says this is a sure thing. It's visible with the naked eye; but under the microscope it's wonderful. And— But, never mind! We'll see for ourselves tonight. You're coming up, of course."

"Sure! And I want to see—" The young man stopped abruptly. A painful color had swept to his forehead. "Er—no. On second thoughts I—I can't tonight," he corrected. In its resolute emphasis his voice sounded almost harsh. "But you—you're coming to dinner with us—tomorrow night, aren't you?"

"Oh, no; no, thank you," began the doctor hastily. Then, suddenly, he encountered his friend's steadfast eye upon him. "Er—that is," he amended in his turn, "unless you—you are willing to let me come very informally, as I shall have to leave almost at once afterward. I'm taking the eight-thirty train that evening."

"Very good. We shall expect you," answered the younger man, with a curious relaxation of voice and manner—a relaxation that puzzled and slightly worried the doctor, who was wondering whether it were the relaxation of relief or despair. The doctor was not sure yet that he had rightly interpreted that steadfast gaze. Two minutes later, Burke, once again self-conscious, constrained, and with his head high, took his leave.

On his way back to work Burke berated himself soundly. Having deliberately bound himself to the martyrdom of a dinner to his friend, he was now insufferably angry that he should regard it as a martyrdom at all. Also he knew within himself that there seemed, for the moment, nothing that he would not give to spend the coming evening in the quiet restfulness of his father's library with the doctor and an Egyptian scarab.

As if all the Egyptian scarabs and Babylonian tablets in the world could balance the scale with Helen on the other side!

Merry Moments

A STERN CHASE. Although not over-particular about her work, Mrs. Brownstone's new maid, fresh from the Evergreen Isle, was somewhat of a stickler for precision in language.

"Is it after eight yet?" asked Mrs. B—— of her one morning as she came in from the kitchen on some errand.

"Yis, mum," replied Bridget, carefully weighing her words, "It is afther it all right, but it hasn't got there yit! It has five minutes yit to thravel!"

WHO WON? Dutch Daly, an entertainer once well known in this country, but now a favorite in England, tells this story:

A certain man, feeling exceedingly unwell, inquired of a friend whom he should consult, and was recommended to an eminent specialist.

"Is he very expensive?" asked the patient.

"Him, no; he'll charge you five dollars for the first visit, and two and a half afterward."

So the invalid went off to the doctor in question, and, upon being admitted to the consulting room, slammed down two dollars and a half, accompanied by the remark:

"Well, doctor, here we are again!"

The doctor calmly picked up the money, opened the drawer in his desk, placed it therein, and locked the drawer.

The patient waited events.

"Well, aren't you going to examine me?" he said, at length.

"No," said the specialist; "there's no need to do it again. Just keep on with the same medicine. Good day."

BUYING A SUBSTITUTE. Bessie had a new dime to invest in ice-cream soda.

"Why don't you give your dime to missions?" said the minister who was calling.

"I thought about that," said Bessie, "but I think I'll buy the ice-cream and let the druggist give it to the missions."

Questions and Answers

H. J. J., Fishers Ferry, Pa. The task of tracing Jesus' steps through his life, and harmonizing the Gospel stories about them, would involve more space than we can devote to it in this column. Good Harmonies have been written by Besse, Broadus and others, any one of which will aid you in ascertaining what you want. While truth presents itself in many aspects, it is not only interesting but important to have more than one witness. Having now four witnesses to the facts of Jesus' life, his labors and his death, it is the most natural thing in the world that, while they all treat the same subject, they should treat it from different angles, according to the impressions received by each narrator, and which he considered of most importance to record. The four evangelists, either separately or when taken together, do not attempt a really historical, consecutive narrative of Jesus' life as a whole; they bring only such portions as impressed them as of the greatest value to the world. To get a clear view of the order of events, the four accounts must be taken as a whole. What one omits the other supplies, each to his liking and according as he was impressed with the importance of the one or the other incident.

Mrs. J. W. D., Atascadero, Calif. 1. If, as Paul said, "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God," (Rom. 10 : 17); if "faith without works is dead" (James 2 : 20), it stands to reason that not only must faith and works go together, but one without the other is useless. Hence, in a church there must be both doctrine, which leads to faith, and there must be also works, as service which flows out of faith, and the right kind of which can only emanate from faith. (II Tim. 3 : 16, 17; Col. 3 : 17.) 2. We cannot, as followers of Jesus, affiliate ourselves with those who do not believe in him as the Son of God and our Saviour. 3. Any denomination that denies the divinity of Christ cannot be called a part of the true Church.

A LITTLE PATRIOT

BY

Frederick A. Reiter

Here I am--your little girl:
I don't have a single curl;
Curls, they say, are mighty fine,
Sister's got 'em--eight or nine.
What's the difrence? I don't care,
Tangles aren't no fun nowhere!

Guess my feet are sort o' brown,
I've been running all aroun';
'While ago ma changed my dress,
Said I was an awful mess!
What's the difrence? I don't care,
Dirt'll wash off anywhere!

See that scratch right on my knee?
Guess you can't---I fell, you see,
Fell right o'er our little pup,
Cried a bit and then got up.
What's the dif'rence? I don't care,
Scratches heal up anywhere!

Folkses say I always smile,
Good luck, bad luck-that's my style!
Can you guess the reason why?
Look what's back o' me, and try!
When the stars and stripes you share,
You can smile most anywhere!

H. J. M., Nazareth, Pa. 1. It is vain to indulge regrets about not obtaining the forgiveness of one who died before you could have an opportunity to make peace with him. While we are enjoined to seek out our brother and obtain his forgiveness (Matt. 5 : 24), and while it is incumbent on us to live in peace with our neighbor at all times, and forgive as we are forgiven (Matt. 6 : 14), we must ever remember that it is God who alone can forgive sins, and that all transgressions are against Him (Ps. 51 : 4). Hence, when you make your peace with God, the author of all forgiveness, you have done all that can be required. 2. In view of John 6 : 65, it may well be said that we should pray to the Father to draw us to Christ. It is only by the moral and spiritual state of the heart, by which we are prepared to listen to the voice of Jesus, that we are brought to Christ, and this willing and receptive attitude is the gift of God alone. 3. As has been pointed out in our columns frequently, no one today is qualified to decide whether or not the various incidents of the world-war are in fulfillment of Bible prophecies. 4. Luke 21 : 23 refers more especially to the distress coming over the land of Judea by the war under Titus.

J. G. C., Roanoke, Va. The island of Cuba is nearly 760 miles long, and the area is 45,881 square miles, a trifle larger than Pennsylvania Cuba's seacoast is about 2,000 miles long, with more fine deep-water harbors than any other country in the western hemisphere. More merchandise enters and leaves the harbor of Havana than any in the United States except New York. Exports for the last fiscal year amounted to $302,000,000 and imports were $171,000,000, leaving a balance of $131,000,000 in Cuba's favor. The exports were $111 per capita and imports $63, a balance of foreign trade of $48 per capita. The value of the 1915-16 sugar crop was $270,000,000, the tobacco yield $35,000,000, citrus fruits and vegetables $5,000,000, pineapples, cocoa, honey, asphalt, henequin, mahogany and cedar $6,000,000, copper and iron $10,000,000. Exports have increased in ten years 200 per cent, and imports 90 per cent. George Reno, Department of Agriculture, Havana, will furnish free information regarding Cuba.

Reader. Blacksliding is a fact so evident that any denial of its possibility counts for little or nothing. The whole life of the Christian is a battle against sin and temptation. If we rely on our own strength, we are sure to fall at some time or other whereas, if we place our reliance upon God and put ourselves in his keeping, he will give us strength and reinforcement, and will keep us day by day. To contend that it is impossible for a good man to fall is to go against the lessons of Scripture and human experience. Many good men have slipped at times. The psalmist writes (Ps. 37 : 23, 24), "A man's goings are established of Jehovah; and he delighteth in his way. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down." To such a one, if he be repentant, the Lord reaches out the hand of help and raises him again. "Whatsoever foes the believer may have, through his own wickedness and corruption and Satan's subtleties," writes a commentator, "the Lord, having begun a good work in him, 'will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ'" (Phil. 1 : 6). Christ stretched forth his hand to save Peter when the apostle was sinking in the waves through loss of faith. We are assured that those who are godly in their hearts will have help in every mischance, if they only seek for it in the right direction. There are passages, however, which show that, in cases where those who, after having been "enlightened" and receiving "full knowledge" of the truth, fall away from grace, they are in a dangerous condition, indeed. They "crucify Christ anew." The certainty of eternal life is given to those who believe, and who stand firm, and who after every slip or mischance repent and come back to the foot of the cross. In general, it may be said that in the case of the backslider, there has been no complete dedication, otherwise there would be no apostasy. See Heb. 10 : 26, 29; John 6 : 37, 14 : 17-29; Heb. 6 : 4-6; Gal. 6 : 14; I Tim. 2 : 4.

The age of Jerusalem as given in the article in the April 4 issue of the Christian Herald should have been 3,368 years, which owing to a typographical error was printed as 2,368.

M. A., Kansas City, Mo. Travelers who have visited the great Mohammedan Mosque of St. Sophia in Constantinople tell of the visibility of inscriptions made in the interior of the building when it was a Christian church. These had been painted over by the Moslem conquerors, but time defeated their purpose of total effacement. Over the entrance is the inscription in Latin: "I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and he shall find pasture." The bricks in the great dome in the interior reveal this inscription: "Deus in medio eius; non commovebitur. Adiuvabit eam Deus vultu suo." The translation may be found in Psalm 46 : 5. These facts are of interest, in view of the present tottering condition of the Moslem power.

J. A. W., Morgantown, N. C. What kind of an instrument was the ancient organ as described in Ps. 150 : 4?

The Hebrew word uggab, translated as organ, properly means that which is inflated or blown, hence a wind instrument. The Septuagint in rendering the passage in Ps. 150 uses organon, which means an instrument for any purpose, but is applied by Plato and others to the pipe, and from which comes our word organ. Our modern organ is of very ancient origin: Nero greatly admired the water organ; in ecclesiastical history, Pope Vitalian I figures as the introducer of the organ, about A.D. 666, but the organ is said to have been used in Spain long before that date.

In response to the request (published in the Mail-Bag recently) for a copy of the hymn beginning "In the crimson blush of morning," and the name of the author, replies have come to the Christian Herald in very large number. The first response was from Rev. A. E. Bloom of Annandale, Minn. Others who have responded with the information desired, are: Rachel Gibson, S. Manchester, Conn., Miss Mina Lloyd, North Adams, Mass., N. P. Weldon, Torrington, Conn., Mrs. Mabel Reynolds Makepeace, Indian Orchard, Mass., Mrs. Hiram Daniels, Groton, Vt., Mrs. Lucie L. Addis, New Milford, Conn., Mrs. Kate M. Goddard, Amesbury, Mass., Mrs. A. Braisland, Arena, N. Y., Mrs. I. M. Blanchard, Worcester, Mass., Mrs. Grace B. Trangott, New York City, N. Y., Linden J. A copy of the book entitled "The Wicked John Goode" was sent to each, as a recognition of their courtesy. There were only two out of the entire number of letters received, in which the wrong poem was sent.

Old-Fashioned Reader, Washington, Iowa. We are not to judge our neighbor (Matt. 7 : 1). A pastor who thinks that the very fact that a candidate for admission to the church comes up before the congregation to receive the hand of fellowship is proof sufficient of a right Christian experience, may have good reason for so thinking. A convert would not do so unless he had a desire for it, and a desire for the fellowship of the godly presupposes a breaking with sin.

M. T. E., Tropic, Fla. The question whether or not the righteous go directly to heaven after death has been discussed repeatedly in the Mail-Bag and a résumé of the subject is contained in the book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered." There is no passage that asserts it explicitly, although there are numerous passages from which the inference can be drawn. Thus, Christ's assurance to the repentant thief (Luke 23 : 43); the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16 : 19-31), and others

A. E. C., Omaha, Neb. In Matt. 24 : 15, the "abominations" spoken of are those which are to come in the sanctuary where the sacrifice is offered. The Jews applied the original prophecy in Dan 9 : 27 to the desecration of the temple by Antiochus, who set up there an idol statue of Juno Our Lord here refers to a future fulfilment The consensus of opinion is that the prophecy referred to the Roman eagles or standards, so hateful to the Jews, which standards the Romans carried who desecrated the temple. This construction is favored by the addition in Luke's account (21 : 20), "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies"

P. P., Macon, Ga. We can but repeat what we have so often said, that one who is tortured with remorse through fear of having committed the sin against the Holy Ghost has not committed it, as, had he done so, and had the Holy Spirit been withdrawn, every right thought as to God would have gone, and the man, instead of being remorseful, would have become wholly indifferent to his own spiritual condition His fears show that the Spirit is still striving with him, to win him to repentance. Let none say he is past saving. Christ came to save and help sinners, and none are too bad or to deeply sunken to be aided. A dying thief on the cross, a Magdalene, a doubting Thomas, a denying Peter, a raging, persecuting Paul, not only were found by Jesus and saved, but were received with open arms. "The Son of Man is come to save that which was lost" (Matt. 18 : 11). You are of those for whom he died. Why not accept Him fully, once and for all?

J. B. M., Kalona, Iowa. The passage in Luke 22 : 36, and preceding verses about the purse, wallet and sword, had each a spiritual significance. The whole is a figurative setting forth of the truth that henceforth the apostles would have need of defense, for outward perils would come upon them. Jesus foresaw the coming persecutions of his followers. This passage has been used to oppose the non-resistance theories advanced by some sects.

Mrs. Green, Gloversville, N. Y., wishes to know the authorship of the following quotations: "A nation rises no higher than its mothers"; "A partnership with God is motherhood" "What strength, what love, what purity, what self-control should belong to her who helps God fashion an immortal soul!"

E. P., New York While conversing on the latest war news at a social gathering lately, the question was asked if the city now called Bagdad was the same city as the one called Nineveh in Bible times? Will you kindly answer"

No, they are not the same the remains of Nineveh are situated on the Tigris 220 miles south from Bagdad. On the other side of the river from the site of Nineveh is the modern town of Mosul.

CAN UNCLE SAM FEED THE WORLD?

The First of a New Series of American Travel Articles on our Country's Greatness

BY FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G Carpenter

IT thrills me when I think of my job. I am to write a series of letters about our new industrial empire from the standpoint of national preparedness. I have agreed to travel over the United States and make on-the-ground studies of the revolution that is going on in our farms, factories and mines. I want to show their importance in this critical stage of our history. I want to investigate their wonderful resources, and how they may best be developed in view of the enormous demands that have arisen in connection with our great war with Germany and with the trade war that will probably result when peace comes.

I wonder if you realize what a great possession the United States is? It is the best business proposition in the assets of the nations. It is by far the richest country on the face of the globe and its possibilities are beyond the dreams of national avarice.

Suppose we take a look at the globe and see what we have. Pick the continents and islands out of the oceans and crowd the land together into one block. Measure it and you will find that, all told, it is just about 52,000,000 square miles, and that the United States owns more than one-sixteenth of the whole. That means that if all the land upon the earth could be joined in one farm and that farm divided into sixteen-acre fields, one acre in every field would belong to us. If it were bunched into farms of 160 acres each, Uncle Sam would own a ten-acre field in every one of those farms.

NOW cast your eye once more at the globe and see where our land lies. It is at just the right angle in the face of the sun to give us a climate that will produce everything that man wants, and at the same time the ozone to supply the ambition and energy to drag the products from the soil. We raise so much that we feed not only ourselves but a large part of the rest of the world, and our country is so situated that we have the best place from which to trade with the whole human race. Lying in the middle of the North American continent, we have water highways which connect us with the millions of Europe and the millions of Asia. It is the best trading stand in the market-place of this big round world.

These girls are labeling cans of meat, packed in Chicago but sold wherever two men meet

Our soil is so good, our mineral resources so great and our position so fitted for the accumulation of wealth that we have already become the richest people of the whole human race. Our wealth is of enormous account as a war asset. It is now estimated at 220 thousand millions of dollars. The amount is so vast that the human mind cannot comprehend it. It is more than one-fourth of all the wealth of all the world. This means that if all the assets of all the earth could be turned into cash, and from the mines could be dragged enough ore to make sufficient twenty-dollar goldpieces to represent that cash, one-fourth of all those goldpieces would belong to us. If the golden eagles could be loaded into bushel baskets, we would own a peck of gold of every basket.

We have accumulated this great wealth, although we have just begun to develop our resources and are still prospecting the country to find out what they are and how they may best be brought forth for the use of mankind. Let us stop and look at a few of our assets. We have now to make a cost efficiency sheet as a military necessity, and, like Germany, must make every atom of material, industry and energy tell. The purpose of my travels will be to learn something of where our wealth lies, to investigate our resources, and find how they may be developed, protected and made most efficient for the present and future. It is my plan to visit our chief food-producing centers, and show something of what part each has in the nation's prosperity. I want to go down into the mines and find out their place in Uncle Sam's account sheet. I want to take up the chief industries, and especially the few industries which the troubles in Europe have made so necessary to our industrial independence.

A LARGE part of my travels will relate to the farms. We need these to supply our own wants and to aid in feeding our allies in Europe. The farms are Uncle Sam's biggest asset. They brought in almost 14,000 millions of dollars last year, which is more than two and a half billion dollars above the receipt of any crop of the past. Nevertheless, the Agricultural Department believes that these crops might be doubled, and improved farming is being introduced into every part of the country. The South has been getting 20 cents a pound for its cotton, and the West about $2 a bushel for its wheat. The farmers received more than one billion dollars for each of those crops in 1915. They now have the capital to inaugurate better soil cultivation. Many of them are using motor cars to carry their grain to the markets, and they are plowing the fields with gasoline tractors. I want to describe the new discoveries in farming, and to give some idea of our crops and the live stock which so affect our meat and bread baskets and the high cost of living.

As it is now, we raise so much on our farms that one would think that bread and meat should be cheap. In 1916 our grain crop amounted to more than six billion bushels, enough to give sixty bushels to every man, woman and child in the United States, or 300 bushels per family. Of this, almost three billion bushels were Indian corn, the best all-round food ration for the body of man. We raise almost all the corn produced by the world. Our crop was equal to 150 bushels per family, and in 1915 we led the world in wheat. We produced that year one peck of every bushel of all the wheat raised upon earth. The amount was equal to fifty bushels per family, and it sold for more than $1.50 per bushel. The crop was worth more than three times all the gold that was dug from the earth in that year.

So much for the bread. Now for the meat. We have, altogether, about 6,000 million dollars' worth of live stock, and our domestic animals are more than 300 millions in number. We have so many farm animals that if we could round them up and divide them evenly among us, every family in the United States would have five hogs, three cattle, two sheep and a horse. In addition, there are countless turkeys, chickens and ducks, and more than four million mules to spare.

As to our mineral resources, they alone would make us the richest of the nations. We have coal in thirty different states, and if our coal fields could be brought together, they would make one great bed seven times as large as the coal fields of all Europe, and more than thirty-five times the area of those of Great Britain. We took out enough last year to equal twenty-two tons for every family in the country, and the black diamonds were worth at the mines more than $700,000,000. There is one little patch of anthracite in Pennsylvania whose yearly output is worth more than one-third of all the gold that is annually mined.

The farms and the mines are only the basis for our great manufacturing industries. Here is another asset of Uncle Sam's wealth which is so great that the human mind cannot comprehend it. We are only at the beginning of our national existence, but we have become the workshop of the world. We have more than 22,000 millions of dollars invested in factories, and our product is worth more than $25,000,000,000 a year. We have about twice as many men as there are in our standing army engaged in making iron and steel of one kind or other, and the additional men in the foundries and machine shops are more than one-third of a million. We have about 500,000 hands engaged in the lumber industry and more than 380,000 employed in the cotton mills. Altogether we have more than 7,000,000 men and women who are earning their living by the work of their hands, and their wages are greater now than ever before.

Our manufacturing product steadily increases, and the variety of our industries extends from year to year. The great war in Europe has forced us into new lines of labor, and we are now making hundreds of articles which we formerly brought at high prices from over the oceans.

I want to investigate the new chemical factories which have recently been established in different parts of the United States, and to show how they will make us independent as to paints, dyes and drugs. I want to visit our great electrical works, which are among the wonders of the world. There is a company at Pittsburg that employs 20,000 hands, and another at Schenectady whose factories cover the area of a good-sized farm. They are making new things in electricity for the factory, the house and the farm and the day will come when all that men will have to do will be to press a button and this "lightning in harness" will do the rest.

Speaking of electricity brings up the subject of Uncle Sam's water power. I expect to show what the falls of Niagara are doing and how we have hundreds of other waterfalls working day and night all the year through to add to the wealth of the nation. It is claimed by government officials that we have about 60,000,000 horsepower which is still undeveloped, and that in addition to the amount already in use. This means that we have that vast force going to waste. It is as though we had 60,000,000 horses pent up in our stables from one year's end to the other. The engineers estimate that the force is equal to the energy produced by 400,000,000 tons of coal. It would be enough to operate all the factories, run all the street cars, light all the houses and heat all the homes of the United States. This force represents a loss in coal and labor of more than $200,000,000 per annum, and this loss will continue until the hydraulic engineers round up the water power bronchos.

But it is impossible to mention all the assets in the great balance sheet of Uncle Sam's wealth. I might speak of our forests, which, notwithstanding the waste of the past, are still enough to make a boardwalk thirty feet wide and an inch thick from the earth to the sun; of our railroads, whose tracks are long enough to reach ten times around the earth at the equator; of our domestic commerce, which surpasses that of any other land upon earth, and of our foreign trade, which last year amounted to $5,500,000,000. In this letter I have mentioned only some of the principal items, crowding a world, as it were, into a nutshell. My correspondence to come will be along the same lines, as I go to and fro over the country. My first letters will relate to the South, where I expect to be traveling for some months to come.

Rallying of Nation's Forces to Produce Food

"WIN the war with food" is the slogan of today. Mobilization of our "soldiers of the commissary" is rapidly under way. With Secretary of Agriculture Houston at the head, innumerable organizations are being formed to urge intensive cultivation to the utmost. Farmers in every state are responding in readiness to give the highest possible service. System and concerted action are taking the place of the usual haphazard individual methods.

The government is moving to turn out such great supplies of foodstuffs that not only the American people and the American army, but the peoples of the European Allies and their armies shall be supplied from the resources of the Western world.

Food conditions in several of the nations of the Entente Allies have been reported as critical, and as a result President Wilson and his Cabinet advisers have concentrated their attention upon what is being done to increase the food supply of the United States and to provide additional ships to carry produce to Europe. Preliminary conferences with members of the British Commission now here, and word received from American diplomats and commercial attachés in the Allied and European neutral capitals, have convinced Administration officials that the food problem is grave, and that the situation is constantly growing worse.

Realizing that it will take time to make more plentiful American harvests, the immediate object of the government will be to prevent waste and systematize the distribution and exportation of foodstuffs so that the best possible use can be made of supplies already on hand.

The Council of National Defense has removed all doubt as to who will dictate the food policies of the nation. Secretary Houston will be supreme, with Herbert C. Hoover, former head of the Belgian Relief Commission, advising as to the food supplies to be furnished to the Allies.

Secretary Houston, after consulting with the heads of five of the country's big farmers' organizations, has submitted to Congress the Administration's program for asserting a firmer control on food production and distribution.

Secretary Houston has planned a complete food census of the nation. He urged the necessity of Congress appropriating $25,000,000 for this work. He said he had heard that food had been stored by people alarmed over the situation, but he did not believe this was general. In his opinion the farmer is quite safe in increasing production, and is sure to find high prices continuing, even if peace were to come now. But he said the farmer should receive a guarantee of a minimum price for those things the government told him he should grow to help the nation. "I suggest that we should have legislation to fix a minimum price," the Secretary said. "I don't believe Congress should attempt to fix prices of things that would be subject to shift, and the power should be conferred on the Executive. Perhaps in certain extreme emergencies there should be the power to fix minimum prices. There might be cases of speculation that could be controlled that way. I suggest that you confer the power on the Council of National Defense to act at the direction of the President in fixing maximum and minimum prices."

Plans for supplying 2,000,000 workers for the country's farms this summer are announced by Secretary of Labor Wilson. Working with the Agricultural Department, the Labor Department's employment service will comb the country for men to till the soil. A preliminary census has disclosed that some 2,000,000 men will be needed. Orders have gone from the Labor Department to twenty zone offices and ninety employment stations scattered through the country to begin preparations for finding that number of men.

The Department of Labor has prepared to mobilize the nation's 1,000,000 boys for work on the farms. The boys will be recruited into semi-military organizations and put under command of officers. They will range in age from sixteen to twenty-one. The plan is based on the volunteer system. Boy Scouts are expected to enlist. The boy army will be known as the "United States Working Boys' Reserve." They will be sent where needed.

The labor scarcity is being met also by the governors of many states, who have called upon county, township and municipal officials to register all available farm help.

Consideration of food problems continues from day to day before committees of both Houses of Congress. Before the House Commerce Committee Secretary Redfield and other representatives of the executive departments urged early passage of the Administration bill to empower the President to control exports. Secretary Redfield did not like to have the bill for which he spoke termed an embargo bill, but rather one to direct exportation.

It has been determined to increase by legislation the powers of the Federal Trade Commission so that it will be in position to deal without gloves with food operators and middlemen who try to run up prices.

Villa's artillerymen repairing their gun carriage. A typical camp scene

VILLA, SOLDIER OF FORTUNE

BY

EDWARD S. O'REILLY

[In this second article the soldier-author gives further glimpses of the desperate enterprises and wonderful military successes of the half-savage Mexican leader, answers some questions, and tells of his indifference to suffering, of his love of slaughter, and of his lawless companions, whose bloodthirstiness appealed to Villa's indian nature, and who carried out his innumberable "executions." Villa, he tells us, is "the Mexican problem" today.]

SUDDENLY, after the disappearance of Villa, who was not heard of for weeks, the whole country was electrified by one of the most spectacular strategic feats of modern warfare. While Villa was lost, he had been making a great circling movement through the desert from the south to the north of Chihuahua. His object was to capture Juarez and secure an entry port from the United States.

One day, half a dozen cowboys rode up to the little railroad station of Moctezuma and dragged the telegraph operator from his desk before he had time to flash a warning. A few minutes later Villa and his band appeared. A number of telegraph operators had enlisted under him, and one of these was placed at the key. Almost without interruption the routine work of the office continued.

Villa learned that the regular daily train was due to arrive at Moctezuma in a few minutes. When it rolled into the station, his soldiers took possession without a shot being fired. The passengers were ordered to leave the coaches and Villa filled the cars with his men. A group of trusted men were stationed on the engine, and the train proceeded on its regular schedule. At every station the men on the engine, supposed to be the regular guards, would stroll into the operator's room and pull him from the key. He would be replaced by a Villa operator, and the train would proceed.

So complete was the success of the scheme that the federal garrisons at Chihuahua or Juarez never suspected the ruse. The regular train was proceeding toward the border in regular fashion, its arrival and departure being properly reported at every station. Villa even succeeded in turning back a troop train from Chihuahua by reporting a burned bridge.

That evening the train drew into the station at Juarez. The federal garrison was scattered about the town, many of them enjoying themselves at the bull-fight, when the harmless-appearing train disgorged a thousand shooting, yelling soldiers, who swept through the streets, killing every man in uniform. In twenty minutes Villa was master of the town. This victory gave new life to the rebellion. Recruits flocked to the standard of Pancho Villa. General Toribio Ortega rode into Juarez and offered his service with 1,500 men from eastern Chihuahua.

An incident which occurred at Jiménez shows the Indian stoicism of Villa. For weeks he had been troubled by an in-growing toe-nail, which caused him intense pain. Dr. Rusk, an American physician in whom Villa had great confidence, happened to be in Jiménez, waiting for a train; and the general sent for him. Dr. Rusk informed him that it would be necessary to jerk the nail out with forceps, by the roots, as a tooth is drawn.

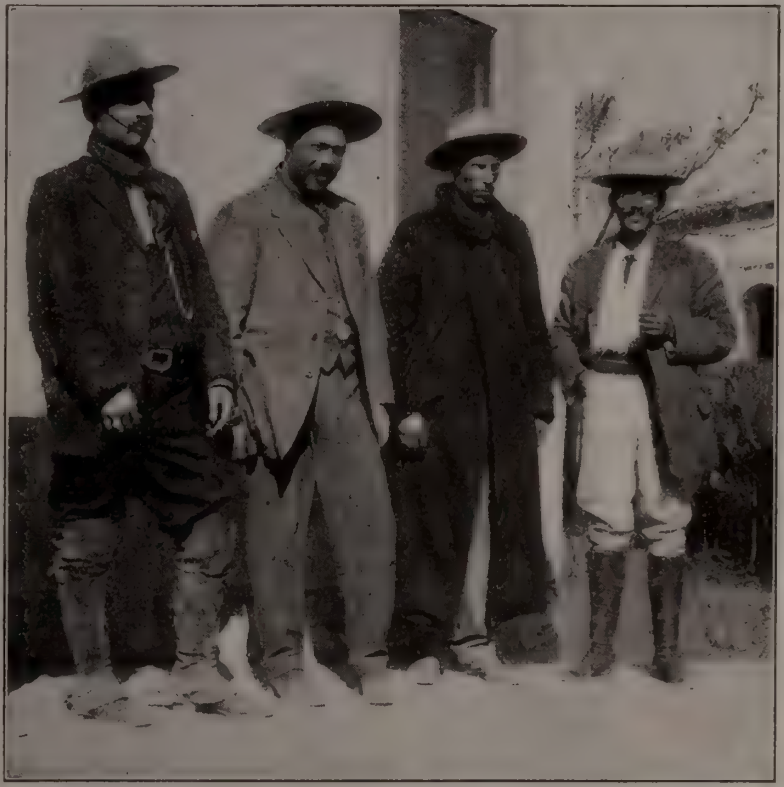
"It is one of the most painful operations known," said the doctor. "You must wait until tomorrow night, when I will have some cocaine from Chihuahua."

"Never mind the medicine. Do it now," ordered Villa.

Dr. Rusk split the nail down the middle and pulled each half from the flesh. It must have caused the most excruciating agony. During the operation I watched Villa's face, and he did not betray the slightest emotion but continued talking to one of his secretaries.

Villa knew that he must soon fight a more important battle. As long as they held Juarez, the federal garrisons at Chihuahua and the greater part of north Mexico drew their supplies from the United States through Juarez. Villa had closed the door.

It was a time of harvest for the ammunition-runners. The embargo on munitions of war was being enforced, and ammunition was contraband. As border sentiment favored Villa, however, it was easy to get ammunition as long as the smugglers received the extortionate prices they demanded. It came in piano cases, buried in cars of coal and packed in cases of canned goods. The army was soon ready.



On the left, General Fierro, Villa's "Butcher", who reloaded his six-shooter six times to execute captured officers, and then reported, "It is done, mi general;" next to him, General Villa

Under orders from Huerta to drive Villa out of Juarez at all costs, the federal army marched northward to the attack. It was commanded by Generals Mercado and Orozco, who had joined forces with the Huertistas. The federal forces there slightly outnumbered Villa. The army of General Mercado, as shown by the official reports, was about 8,000 men. Villa's army numbered little more than 7,000.

Villa marched his army out into the sand dunes at Tierra Blanca, nine miles south of Juarez, and prepared to meet the federals. His forces were outnumbered and the federals were well supplied with modern artillery.

Mercado and Orozco made a direct frontal attack along the railroad. Stubbornly contesting every foot of the way, the Villista troops slowly withdrew for several miles. At the right moment Villa gave the signal, and like a cloud of hawks his cavalry swept out of the sand dunes upon the unprotected flanks of the extended federal army. The battle was won, and the broken and disorganized federal force withdrew to Chihuahua.

Villa halted only long enough to secure a fresh supply of ammunition, and followed. The federals were in no condition to make a stand, and evacuated Chihuahua. They made a desperate march of 180 miles across the desert to Ojinaga, a small town on the Rio Grande, Villa's forces following at their heels and killing the stragglers day by day. Here the federals stood at bay. Villa immediately attacked. After a desperate battle of five days, the federals broke, and, plunging into the Rio Grande, crossed to the American bank and surrendered to Major McNamara of the United States army.

Villa was now undisputed master of Chihuahua. In the three battles he had captured thousands of Mauser rifles, sixteen cannon and many prisoners. Rushing back to the state capital, he prepared for the advance southward on Torreon, where Huerta had gathered his main army of the north.

The battle of Torreon was the greatest success of Villa's military career. It was really a series of battles, lasting several days. I will not attempt to describe it. One incident, however, I will tell, as it throws a light on Villa as a man and military leader. Guarding the pass between Gomez Palacio and Torreon is a sugar-loaf hill, which had been strongly fortified by the federals. This hill must be taken before Villa could enter the city. For two days his soldiers had charged up the hill, only to be beaten back from the crest by the storm from the machines and rifles of the defenders. At night I have watched the Villistas start up this hill, seen the trenches at the top light up in a circle of fire, and traced the position of the attacking party by the answering flashes. Gradually the wavering pin-points of flame would creep up the slope, then break before the deadly hail and sweep downward, like a wave receding from the shore.

Villa was desperate, and at last he improvised a new plan of attack. Selecting two hundred picked men, he made them lay down their rifles and armed each man with half a dozen hand grenades. These grenades were crude affairs, made of tin cans, loaded with dynamite and nails, with a short fuse sticking from the top. Each man was ordered to light a cigarette and keep it burning to light the fuse. When all was in readiness, Villa took his place at the head of the column and gave the order to advance quietly. With burning cigarettes shielded in cupped hands, the line silently crawled up the hill. Not a shot was fired until they were near the top, when the guns of the defenders again began blazing. The attacking party could not halt and shoot back. Their only weapons were the bombs, and to use them they must get in close.

British and French War Commissions at Washington. The British Commission, under the leadership of Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, reached Washington, coming by rail from Halifax, on April 22, receiving an enthusiastic welcome at the Capitol. Aside from formal calls upon the President, the Vice-President and other leaders in American political life, and preliminary introductions of British technical experts to the officers of the various American departments with whom they came to confer, the British Commission really marked time pending the arrival of the French Commission. The French War Commissioners reached Hampton Roads on a fast French liner, which was taken off the admiralty service for the special purpose of the trip, and was convoyed across, being met 100 miles from the American coast by vessels from the American fleet. At Hampton Roads the French Commissioners were taken aboard the President's yacht Mayflower, which carried them to the Washington Navy Yard, where they went ashore and were officially received by Secretary Lansing and a committee of American army and naval officers and diplomats on April 25—almost 140 years to the day since Lafayette landed on the shores of South Carolina. The British Commission was well received, Mr. Balfour being cheered at every appearance. But General Joffre, the idol of France, appealed to the imagination of the waiting people, and the progress of the victor of the Marne from the Navy Yard to the residence of Henry White, former ambassador to France, was marked by outbursts of enthusiasm. This mansion will be occupied by the French Commissioners while in the United States and the British Commission will have the exclusive use of the former residence of Franklin MacVeagh, recently leased by Third Assistant Secretary of State Breckinridge Long. The French Commissioners were presented to the President on April 26, making the same round of official visits previously performed by the British Commissioners, after which both commissions began the serious work for which they had come to America. It was stated unofficially that Britain needed food and ships, while it was reported that General Joffre intended to make a plea for men, especially for mechanics competent to conduct the work of reconstruction in the rear of advancing armies. Mr. Balfour is quoted as stating that the British and French Commissions had no thought of arranging a permanent alliance with the United States.

First Gun of the War. The first shot in the war between America and Germany was fired by a naval gunner on the American steamship Mongolia on April 19. One shot was fired at the periscope of a submarine, scoring a clean hit at a distance of about 1,000 yards. The periscope was seen to be shattered, and it was thought that the submarine was sunk. Captain Rice of the Mongolia reported the event on reaching a British port. The Mongolia's gunners were under the command of Lieutenant Bruce Richardson Ware, Jr., of Massachusetts.

America Loans to Britain. On April 25 the Secretary of the Treasury, William G. McAdoo, handed to Lord Cunliffe, governor of the Bank of England and member of the Balfour party, a warrant on the United States treasury for $200,000,000, receiving in return a note of the British government. This is said to be the largest warrant ever drawn by the Federal treasury. The money was at once placed to the credit of the British government at the Reserve Bank of New York, being paid to the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. in twenty cashiers' checks of $10,000,000 each. It was announced that the major portion of this money would be used to pay amounts due American manufacturers from the British government.

Japanese Government Wins Election. The recent Japanese elections resulted in the election of 217 supporters of the government and 164 members of the opposition, the result being a political victory for the Terauchi cabinet.

Sweden Is Hungry. There were food riots in Stockholm on April 21, the people gathering before the Riksdag building, where they were addressed by officials whose speeches were interrupted with cries of "Republic!" and "Revolution!" As a result of the demonstration, the lower house of the Swedish parliament voted a credit of nearly $30,000,000 for the purchase of food supplies.

Robert College Closed. Because of the breaking off of relations between Turkey and the United States, Robert College and the Bible House at Constantinople are closed and members of the American colony have made immediate preparations for leaving Turkey. Other American missionaries were reported as remaining at their posts at this writing, Turkish authorities in other parts of the empire not being in sympathy with the action of the government at Constantinople. Reports of Americans from Constantinople who reached Paris on April 25 describe conditions in the city as extremely grave, 35,000 of the poor being on the verge of starvation and nearly 100 cases of death from starvation being actually reported. Sugar was reported at $5 a pound, coffee at $9, tea at $6. Prices of other foods are said to be equally prohibitive. There are 94 missionaries under the American Board and 18 children of missionaries in Turkey at the present time, while the value of the mission property is in the neighborhood of $4,000,000.

Spain to Stay Neutral. Marquis Manuel Garcia Prieto, formerly president of the Spanish Senate, on April 19 formed a new cabinet to replace the cabinet under Count de Romanones, which had resigned. The new cabinet announced that it would maintain strict neutrality toward all the belligerents. Various reports indicated that the Romanones cabinet had been in favor of war and had sent a note to the German government which was in the nature of an ultimatum. The new cabinet is said to have dispatched a note to Germany warning her that the end of Spanish patience was in sight and suggesting some modifications of U-boat practices. Copenhagen reports on April 25 indicated that Denmark might also be urging Germany to modify her submarine war. Later reports indicated that European neutrals had succeeded in securing some concessions.

Root Heads Russian Commission. Former Secretary of State and Senator Elihu Root is head of the American Commission to be sent to Russia to confer with the new provisional government on the ways in which the United States can assist the democratic movement in Russia and aid it in the war against Germany.

New Dreadnought Launched. The new United States superdreadnought New Mexico was launched at the Brooklyn Navy Yard April 23, being christened by Miss Margaret De Baca, daughter of the late governor of the state, by the breaking of a Pueblo Indian jar filled with mixed waters from the Rio Grande and the Pecos. The New Mexico will mount twelve 14-inch guns and her complement will be 1,150 officers and men. She is 624 feet long, will displace about 32,000 tons, and will be electrically driven.

For the Army and Navy. Recruiting took a big leap forward after the first of April, the army from April 1 to 25 obtaining 32,108 recruits, about one-sixth of the number needed to put the army on a war basis. They were applying at the rate of about 2,000 a day, while the navy recruiting stations were enrolling men at a similar rate. Plans are being perfected for seventeen training-camps in different parts of the country for the training of officers, each camp to be limited to 2,500 men. These men will receive three months' training under regular army officers to prepare them to serve as officers in the new army. At last reports some of the camps had enrolled more than double the official quota.

First Loan Oversubscribed. The Secretary of the Treasury announced on April 21 that the first offering of war securities of $200,000 of treasury certificates had been heavily oversubscribed. The certificates were offered only to financial institutions.

Fragments of News. The $7,000,000,000 bond bill, which because of amendments was sent to conference after its passage by the Senate, was finally passed by both houses and sent to the President on April 23. . . . The entrance of the United States into the war was celebrated all over Great Britain on April 20. Bishop Brent of the American Episcopal Mission in the Philippines addressed a notable audience in Old St. Paul's, London, which included the king and queen, and the Stars and Stripes flew with the Union Jack from the same flagstaff on the Victoria Tower at Westminster. It is said that in all the history of the House of Parliament no flag other than the British had ever before been hoisted upon its standards. Similar meetings in France on April 22 also welcomed America's participation in the struggle for democracy. The American flag is said to have been broken out from the top of the Eiffel Tower. . . . Fierce fighting in the streets of Chengtu, China, between troops of the provinces of Szechuan and Hunan was reported April 23, being precipitated by an attempt of the government of Szechuan to disband the provincial troops. The British, French and Japanese consuls arranged an armistice. . . . Another Belgian relief ship, the Kongsli, carrying 6,000 tons of wheat, was sunk in a so-called safe zone in the North Sea on April 20. She is thought to have struck a mine. . . . Paul Miliukoff has accepted for the new Russian government the gift of a reproduction of the Statue of Liberty, which is to be given by America. The enterprise involves the expenditure of $500,000, which is expected to be raised by popular subscription. . . . On April 19 an emergency order was placed by the American government for 6,000 Lewis guns to be used by the army, navy and marine corps. . . . Mrs. George Thatcher Guernsey of Kansas was elected president of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington April 19. . . . The War Department announced on April 19 that men between the ages of 18 and 25 who were eligible for conscription under the projected army draft law at the beginning of the war could not evade service by entering the state of matrimony. . . . The Interstate Commerce Commission on April 19 granted permission to all railroads to file supplementary tariffs increasing freight rates generally fifteen per cent., effective June 1. It is expected that the commission will investigate the reasonableness of the new rates in time to authorize them by the effective date. . . . The United States military academy at West Point on April 20 graduated the 1917 class ahead of schedule time, 139 men receiving diplomas. . . . For patriotic reasons the Christian Endeavor convention, planned to meet in New York July 4 to 9, was called off April 24. It was felt that at this time the transportation services of the country might be required for the transportation of troops, and unnecessary traveling by civilians should be discouraged; and also that the $250,000 which the convention would cost could better go to relieve suffering in Europe and to care for the wants of enlisted men. The convention will not be held until the end of the war. It was also announced that the Presbyterian General Assembly set for Dallas, Texas, in May and the Congregational National Council set for Los Angeles in June had been postponed.

Congress for the Draft. Both houses of Congress shortly before midnight on April 28 passed the Administration's army bill, the Senate 81 to 8, the House 397 to 24. The House rejected the volunteer system by 313 to 109. The Senate placed the ages affected by the draft at 21 to 27, added an amendment restricting the sale of liquor to soldiers and in the neighborhood of camps, and another authorizing the raising of an expeditionary force such as Colonel Roosevelt contemplated. The House fixed the limits of the draft at 21 to 40. Because of the differences in the two bills as passed, conference between the two houses was necessary before the bill could become a law, and as this was written it appeared probable that the two houses would agree before May 5.

Torpedo Takes American Lives. The American armed tank ship Vacuum was torpedoed on April 28. At last reports Lieutenant Thomas, U. S. N., in command of the gun crew, and nine of his staff were missing.

Allied Commissioners at Mount Vernon. The members of the British and French war missions joined on April 29 in a tribute to the memory of George Washington at Mount Vernon. The flags of the three great democracies floated above the tomb of the first president. Mr. Balfour and Viviani spoke eloquently of Washington's greatness and of America's power and purpose.

Progress and Problems of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON Thursday morning the British admiralty made public its weekly statement of the losses of British vessels in the war zone proclaimed by Germany around the British Isles. This report showed the greatest number of vessels sunk since these reports began with the week of February 28. It is interesting to compare these successive statements.

Tabulated statement of losses by mine and submarine:

Week ending		Ships of 1600 tons and over	Ships of less than 1600 tons
February	28	15	6
March	7	14	9
..	14	13	4
..	21	16	8
..	28	18	7
April	4	18	13
..	11	17	2
..	18	19	9
..	25	40	5

Nine fishing vessels in addition were sunk in the week ending April 25.

The publication of this report caused a sensation not only in Great Britain but among her allies, and almost immediately the British public, through the English newspapers, began to demand the full facts. So conservative an organ as the London Times said in commenting on this official report: "If fuller details were furnished, the case would be found to be still worse. We see no good, but much harm, in trying to shirk or evade the facts." The Daily Mail called the situation "very grave." The Daily Telegraph said: "The position brooks no delay. Not only this country, but the whole empire and the allied cause, is imperiled so long as losses at sea are in excess of production of new ships."

On Friday the stir in the press increased, and all the morning papers emphasized the seriousness of the U-boat campaign and the necessity for food-saving. Captain Bathurst, the parliamentary secretary of the food ministry, declared that the consumption of bread was averaging six pounds per head per week instead of the prescribed four pounds, while the newspapers said hardly one person in ten had heeded the warning by Lord Devonport, food controller, when he put the public on honor to observe the ration limit.

Some papers said a complete and rigid rationing scheme was not merely probable but had been decided upon, and that bread tickets were in the printers' hands.

The official statements were hardly less radical than those of the press. For instance, Sir Arthur Stanley, president of the Board of Trade, speaking Thursday in London, said: "We have not yet found a way of dealing with the submarines, so as to remove the danger of their being an enormously important factor in determining the outcome of the war. The effect of the submarine war upon the existence of the British empire is simply this—that we cannot continue to bring into this country all the supplies and materials required for our existence, for the continuance of the war, and for the actual need of our industries."

The results of the submarine campaign have undoubtedly been concealed to a dangerous degree from the world in general, particularly since February of this year. It is known that up to January 1, 1917, in round figures, 4,500,000 tons had been sunk, and since that date well over 3,000,000 tons, making a total over 7,500,000 tons, or about 18 per cent. of the world's shipping as it existed on January 1, 1915, tonnage belonging to the Central Powers not being counted.

It is not on food alone that this submarine blockade threatens Great Britain, but it is also in raw materials, absolutely necessary for her in order to manufacture various things for her armies in the field.

Further excitement has been caused in Great Britain by the fact that twice during the week German destroyer flotillas have slipped through the British patrolling squadrons in the British Channel and bombarded British ports.

In the first raid the Germans attacked Dover, inflicting little damage, it is reported, and subsequently losing admittedly two destroyers, whose crews were captured by the British. The Germans also claimed to have sunk a couple of British vessels, but this the British denied. Before visiting Dover the Germans attacked Calais on the opposite French shore, causing some casualties and sinking a French torpedo boat.

The second raid was made on Friday, April 27, Ramsgate being attacked. Some casualties and some material damage were inflicted before the German vessels were driven away. The day before, the French port of Dunkirk was also raided by a German squadron.

GREAT attention has been paid to the interior situation in Russia during the past week. The radical elements are growing impatient and are openly opposing the doctrinaire and conservative elements of the provisional government. The workingmen's and soldiers' councils are making all sorts of advanced demands.

The peasantry are also causing considerable trouble, their interpretation of the revolution being that it authorizes them to seize the land belonging to other people, and somewhat naturally the other people object, hence disturbances of greater or less extent. In south Russia the situation is complicated by the fact that a large proportion of the population is not in sympathy with the objects of the revolution and is inclined to support a return to the rule of the Czar. Rumor has it that fighting has occurred in and around Odessa for these reasons.

The effect of all these things on the army has been rather disturbing. It is admitted that there have been many desertions, and that there is great disorganization. Official dispatches of April 27 reported the retirement of 114 officers holding headquarters commands following a visit of War Minister Guchkoff to the southwestern (Russian) front. The Russian Socialists caught in Belgium at the commencement of the war—Brussels being a center of refuge for disaffected Russians—are to be allowed by the German government to return to Russia through Germany, and in addition the Bulgarian Socialists have opened communication with their Russian brethren, who are officially reported as firmly supporting the government and taking a prominent part in the reorganization of the nation to battle to victory. Other Socialists have returned to Russia, through Germany, from Switzerland, and are agitating against the provisional government. On April 26 one of these, Lenine, with his audience were driven into the street by an angry crowd because of his attacks on the provisional government.

On the Lens-Auberive line of the western front the fighting was very violent during the closing days of last week and the opening and middle of the present week—April 20–27.

On the French portion of this front northeast of Soissons the French succeeded in driving the Germans farther northward and occupied the village of Saney, almost directly east of Nanteuil la Fosse and north of Celles, both of which places were taken by the French the other day. This capture practically completed the possession by the French of all the country lying west of the road leading from Vailly on the Aisne north to Jouy.

On Saturday and Sunday very hard fighting occurred on the line extending from Hurtebise, directly west of Craonne, westward to Ailes. Here the Germans launched an attack in force on the French positions, after violent artillery preparation. According to the French version this attack was completely repulsed and the assailants suffered heavy losses.

South of Moronvilliers, between Rheims and Auberive, further determined fighting took place. The Germans say that the French made another attempt to break through here, but did not succeed, while the French assert that they improved their positions in Moronvilliers wood. There also seems to have been considerable fighting in the Auberive region.

Still farther east in the Argonne forest the French made an attack which penetrated to the German second line trenches.

On Monday, the British again became active after several days of comparative calm. The heaviest fighting seems to have been in the immediate neighborhood of Lens. According to the German official version the British northwest of Lens penetrated their first-line trenches on a front of 500 yards, but were immediately ejected therefrom by a counter-attack. The British version is the modest statement, "We made progress."

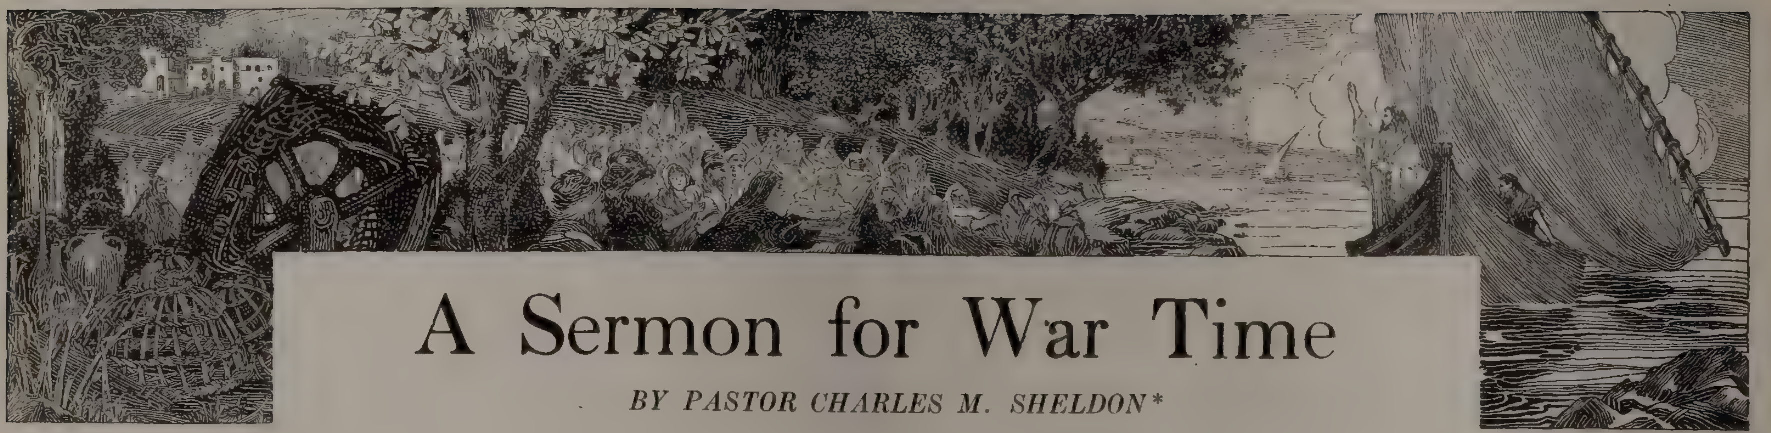
Farther south, near the Scarpe River, in the morning the British captured Gravelle on the main road between Arras and Douai, directly north of Fampoux. South of this river, to the east of Bapaume, they also report the taking of Trescault, south of the Havrincourt station on the railroad from Bapaume to Cambrai, and also of the wood of Havrincourt, which extends from Havrincourt to Metz-en-Couture.

Tuesday and Wednesday saw frightfully hard fighting in the vicinity of Gravelle, in which both sides lost enormously, and the villages changed hands several times, while the battlefield was literally piled with the dead.

Thursday found the Germans still in possession of the eastern outskirts of the village, while the British held the center and western portions.

On this portion of the western line the British critics state that the Germans have the greatest concentration of reserves so far made during the war in the rear of their lines, while the French military critics are calling the attention of their countrymen to the fact that in its broad outlines the German position between Lens and Champagne resembles that of Napoleon at Austerlitz.

The latter indeed seem to think that von Hinderburg eventually intends to follow the Napoleonic tactics at Austerlitz and advance his center in an attempt to crush the opposing center, while holding the enemy stationary, or nearly so, on his wings. These critics do not, however, expect this strategy to succeed, but it is to be noticed that all of them agree that a long and bloody battle will take place on the line between Lens and Craonne.



A Sermon for War Time

*BY PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON

TEXT—Phil. 4:2. "Be of the same mind."

NOTHING in all the history of the church has been so discouraging as the differences existing between those who call themselves Christ's disciples. The differences in their creeds, their teachings, their orders of service.and their policy have been so great that at times they have seemed to contradict all that the Master stood for. There are at the present time no less than one hundred distinct sects of nominal Christians in the United States alone, and in the world at large over one hundred and fifty. These divisive bodies have in many instances been a stumbling-block to the multitude outside the church and a serious hindrance to the cause of Christ's kingdom on earth.

Grave as are these theological and sectarian differences in the minds of Christ's disciples, the present war has accentuated even what seem like more radical divergences from fixed principles in Christian conduct and belief. In Great Britain, with all its tremendous incentive toward the war spirit, there are more than 20,000 Christian men and women who are opposed to the war from conscientious principles, and they cannot be classed as fanatics or fools, since the majority of them are college-bred men and women, many of them of high rank in the literary and social life of the country. In our own country very many people, Christian members in the churches, are differing absolutely as to questions of military training, and even the fundamental question of war itself. Feeling is so strong and even bitter that one man in a church who has objected to his boy going into a military training camp on account of its demoralizing character has been almost ostracized by the other members, and even called a traitor. The man is willing to have his boy enlist and give his physical life, if it is required, but he is not willing to have him subjected to the temptations of a camp life, where even Uncle Sam does not protect the boys he calls to the colors. Sharp lines are being drawn down through the churches in many places, separating the war advocates from the pacifists, and threatening to create a division that will hinder the real work of the Master and be a source of suspicion and even hatred.

FACING the facts as they are; realizing that the world is at war and that this country is involved, whether we like it or not; realizing also the sad fact that fathers and mothers all over the country may be called on to make the supreme sacrifice of their boys, taken out of the young people's societies, the church membership, the Christian Associations and the homes; realizing also that thousands of these boys will be allowed to go, even by parents who do not believe in war, it is a pertinent question to raise among Christian people and especially Christian men and women in the churches: Is there any place where the Christian can find a common meeting-ground with every other Christian, and, in spite of all differences, be of the same mind?

If this country is going into the real war, and its men and boys are going to die in a war which they did not make and for which they are not to blame, all Christians can agree that no spirit of hate or malice should be found in the heart, and no song of hate should be sung by any one who engages in the actual fighting. If, as President Wilson says, the United States is going into the war to preserve civilization, the spirit of those participating should be entirely free from personal bitterness or a desire to annihilate an "enemy."

IN Victor Hugo's Les Miserables, Enjolras, the young republican, aims his musket at a member of the National Guard. One of Enjolras's friends says, "He might be your brother." Enjolras says, "He is"; and a tear rolls over his face as he says it. There is a vast difference, even in war, between the spirit that carries hatred and malice and a desire for vengeance, and the spirit that loves even its so-called "enemies." And at the present moment, in England, the world is actually viewing the unique spectacle of the command of the Master to love our enemies. In the great detention camps where the German prisoners are kept, they are given the most humane and even luxurious treatment. Thousands of them are being housed in great buildings like Alexandra Palace, where they not only have the most sanitary and comfortable beds and food, but every German soldier, private as well as officer, is allowed a vegetable or flower garden, lawn tennis, musical and dramatic entertainments, special religious services, and large freedom for learning trades or practicing the arts and sciences with which they have been familiar at home. It is doubtful if ever in the history of the world any nation ever treated its "enemies" as Great Britain is treating its German prisoners. Thousands of them are bewildered over the experience through which they are going, and confess that they have never enjoyed such privileges and lived such a comfortable and luxurious life in their own country. When they finally go home, they will carry with them a sense of human brotherhood which will abide with them through life.

All men who are entitled to the great name "Christian" must find here a common ground. Hate cannot find a place in the feeling and conduct of those who are, thousands of them, unwillingly forced into this world conflict. We must all be of the "same mind" at this point.

ANOTHER place where the Christian can be "of the same mind" is in the determination that, whatever part America takes in this war, she has no desire or design to acquire territory, or "conquer" any other people by force of arms. The absence of this motive in war, historically, is so rare that it may be said to mark a new era in the conduct of a nation. In the wars of history, the overwhelming majority of them have been carried on with a selfish motive, and either conquest or gain has been the avowed purpose. The purpose to punish a people or glory over their losses must be absent from America's participation in this world-conflict. Here, surely, all Christians can "be of the same mind."

All Christians ought to be able to agree that, no matter what happens in the present crisis in America, no circumstances should be allowed to create in this country a military camp like that of Europe. The military idea must never be allowed to get possession of the mind of the youth of this country. If armies must be raised, and engines of destruction must be made to destroy, they themselves must be ultimately destroyed and not allowed to develop a professional "soldier" spirit in America. At this point the war man and the pacifist must get together. If they cannot agree on this proposition, there must be something wrong with one or the other. Any one who calls himself a Christian ought to agree with any other that militarism, as such, is a monstrosity and cannot be defended as a national policy. The final outcome of this present war should be the abolition of all war.

Especially ought the Christian mind to be against the proposition that vast sums of money and large numbers of men must be set aside for use in future wars. The one great lesson that this war is teaching the world is the folly and uselessness of future conflict. The Christian, of all men, and the church, of all organizations, must emphasize the vision of a world without armies and navies. The blunder of Europe must not be repeated in America. If history is going to be made, as seems probable, with the rapidity that has characterized the Russian revolution, we may reasonably expect such an overthrow of autocracy in the monarchical systems that it will overthrow militarism itself. Every member of every church ought to be of the "same mind" in the demand and the faith that America, in spite of enormous "preparedness" schemes and the munition makers' dreams of unlimited income from limitless wars, is not going to be a military nation. It Christians cannot be of the "same mind" on this basic proposition, there is something wanting somewhere. The mind of the Master could be no other. The mind of his follower can be no less.

IN the present hysterical excitement and divergence of opinions, all Christians should be of the "same mind" in believing in the future federation of the nations of the world. It makes no difference how we have disagreed over the causes of the war, or the conditions that have drawn us into it. Most of these factors have been outside the reach of our individual choices. But concerning the future and its possibilities there should be no doubt. No matter how long or terrible the present war may be, or how severe its losses, one great hope and desire should find a firm resting-place in every Christian heart. The world will emerge from this horror with a Christian faith in the brotherhood of men. German, British, French, Russian, Italian, Bulgarian, Rumanian, Serbian, Turk, Hindu, American, are capable of enduring friendship. In spite of all hate and savagery, in spite of all the hideous wounds on nature and humanity, the ruthless destruction of works of art, in spite of the horrors of scientific murder on a scale never before witnessed, it is possible for the nations to forget and forgive. The vineyards of France will bloom with fragrance again. The bloody trenches will become gentle depressions covered with nature's kindly verdure. Future time will heal the wounds that present times have made. The capacity of the different nations for loving is as large potentially as their capacity for hating, and far more lasting; for hate exhausts, while love recreates, and endures long after hate has ceased to be even a hideous memory. All Christians can be of the "same mind" in their yearning prayer for the golden age of brotherhood, and if they have the mind of the Master they must believe in its practical possibility. To deny it is to deny the teaching of Jesus and the unchanging purpose of the Divine Hope of God.

"LET this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." The church members of America ought to see eye to eye on the main issues. A united church faces such a prospect for power and usefulness as never before in its history. After the war weapons have been left to rust in the field, and the munition factories are making agricultural implements for a smiling, food-producing, happy world, Russia will open her doors to the Bible and the missionary; Europe will be, as it has not been for centuries, a free field for Christian education; standing armies will no longer shake the earth with their tread, and the vision of the prophet Joel will be a reality. If the Christians of America will unite on the essentials, ignore the trivial differences of sectarianism, exalt the kingdom of Jesus over the existence of denominationalism, plan for the near future conquest of the human heart after the present physical destruction, the church will enter upon the greatest development of its history. The most glorious chapter in Christianity will begin. Let us be of the "same mind," that we may help the Master to "draw all men" up unto himself.

The union of Christians in the great fundamentals is necessary at this crisis in American history. Instead of creating differences, the crisis should create nearness of faith in the power of organized Christianity to put an end to wars, to create love to take the place of hate, to bring the nations together in a league of mutual helpfulness, and, as a final result, redeem the world and bring it to kneel humbly and joyfully at the feet of the Redeemer.

The Saviour's Call

THE Saviour came to earth
The lost to seek and save.
A messenger of lowly birth,
For us his life he gave.
We hear his welcome voice,
A call for you and me.
We hear the message and rejoice.
It comes to set us free.

We hear his earnest call:
"O sinner, come to me!"
Oh, hear it, heed it, one and all!
A blessing it shall be
Whoever comes shall know
The joy of pardoned sin.
The heavy burden light shall grow
When Jesus reigns within.

Oh, let the Saviour come
And dwell within your heart.
He'll come and make your heart his home
And sweetest joys impart.
Come, sinner! heed his call;
The Saviour gives you rest;
Own him the gracious Lord of all—
And be forever blest.

Come, weary one, come now!
Accept the Crucified!
For you he wore upon his brow
A crown of thorns—and died!
No other love so great;
To you 'tis freely given;
For you it opens wide the gate
To all the joys of heaven

DAILY MEDITATION

Reverend
E. W. Caswell
and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

The Ministry of Meditation

SUNDAY, May 13. Josh. 1 : 8. "Thou shalt meditate therein day and night." Why should Joshua so meditate in "the book of the law?" Because by meditation we get the heart of a thing. Memory may give us the letter; it is only meditation that will give us the spirit. We may know all the words of a poem, and yet know nothing of the holy place where its genius dwells. The shy spirit of a great poem is something like a shy bird—it only comes out as we watch long in perfect stillness. And so it is with the law of the Lord; a swift, rushing reading gives us nothing; prolonged meditation introduces us into its mood, and we have fellowship with the spirit in which it was born.

Nowadays there is too much reading and too little thinking. We run about over wide surfaces, we do not descend into any depths. We know the letter, we are strangers to the spirit. One saying of the Lord, meditated upon, will yield more inspiration than a whole chapter read at a gallop. We talk of "doing" things. We "do" Rome in a couple of days. We "do" the English Lake District in a few hours. We "do" much and we "see" nothing. We read much and we do not enter "the secret place of the Most High."

"Be still and know that I am God." There is a knowledge into which we enter when the soul is perfectly quiet, when we have laid aside the feverishness of the fretful day, and permit our wearied souls the ministry and solace of contemplation. In these quiet seasons the mind is not so much reasoning her way to conclusions as just feasting upon the glory of the Lord. Logic is laid aside, and the soul gives herself to devotion. And in such moments we have the unspeakable help of the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of counsel and of might. He will guide our contemplations, and he will help us to appropriate the glory upon which we gaze. Our meditation will be sweet; and more than sweet, for in such meditation we shall absorb the strength in which we can resume our journey, and take up the next task on the ever-varying road. J. H. Counting the Cost

MONDAY, May 14. Luke 14 : 28. "Which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost?" The achievement of Christian character is like building a tower, in respect of lofty aim, solid foundation and perpendicularity. It also involves expense; hence the necessity of counting the cost before the process begins. A tower is not a temporary structure; hence the material must be the best. A tower is designed to be beautiful as well as permanent; therefore its architect must be an artist, a beauty-lover. By so much as it is high, it will be tested by storms; therefore it must be strong as well as beautiful. What a perfect parable of Christian character!

To live a Christian life is not a matter of a day, or of a few days, or of a few years. This tower must stand while life lasts. It is not enough that we "profess and call ourselves Christians"; we must adorn the doctrine: that is, we must vindicate and demonstrate it. Our tower must illustrate the beauty of holiness. Nor is it sufficient that we be mere "fair-weather Christians." Life has its storms, earthquakes, tidal-waves. When others, who have not faith, fall, we must remain erect. Our faith is to keep us from falling.

Is this making the Christian life a hard task? Well, that is the kind of an undertaking it is—an artistic work, a life-long work, a stormproof work. Why deceive ourselves? This is a tower we are building, not a doll's house, not a summer pavilion. Is the world full of adventurous souls? This is the great adventure, the heroic task, to build our tower worthily. C. C. A.

The Gift of Grace

TUESDAY, May 15. Gal. 3 : 22. "The Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe." Righteousness in the sight of God can come to us only as a free gift of grace from our Lord Jesus Christ. God has given us his holy law to teach us what is pleasing in his sight and what we must avoid on pain of forfeiting his good pleasure. The law is perfect, but the men from whom this law exacts a faultless obedience in every thought, desire, word and deed are not perfect. Their performance of the law is superficial, external, mechanical. It cannot break the bondage into which the best powers of our soul are fallen. It cannot give life. If it could do that, says the apostle in the preceding verse, our righteousness would indeed come out of the law. We would go to heaven on the record of our righteous living, our good works. It is, therefore, not a slander upon our character when Scripture declares all the doings of men contaminated with sin, and when it says even of our righteousnesses that they are filthy rags.

The teaching of universal human depravity may seem shocking to us, but it is verified to us by our daily experience, if we are only careful to observe our actions and the motives promoting our actions by the light of God's holy law. This humiliating doctrine is not published to lead us to despair, but to point to us the way out of our misery. For this reason Christ has the Gospel proclaimed, viz., that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have everlasting life.

This promise is just as universal as men's sin. From our accusing conscience, from the witness of our misspent lives, we turn again and again to the Reconciler. He is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. He has assumed our tasks and completed them. He has borne the punishment of our guilt. His righteousness becomes ours through faith. We make it our own by believing that it was procured for us. We refuse to listen to any proposition that would lead to righteousness before God, except this one, which embraces only these two elements: the promise of the Saviour and the sinner's faith in that promise. Reflecting the Glory

WEDNESDAY, May 16. II Cor. 3 : 18. "But we all, with unveiled face reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." A certain glass window had a sign painted on it in letters of gold. When the letters were removed, it was found that the sun's continual shining had struck the letters through the glass so they could not be erased. The follower of Christ, by reflecting the image of his Master, becomes more and more like him, being changed into the same image from glory to glory.

If the body and the mind take on the nature of what they feed upon, the soul absorbs and reflects the images formed within and hung on memory's walls. The law of assimilation makes one like what he loves; therefore Paul, enumerating the graces of goodness, says, "Think on these things." We must have a burning heart of love if we would become a shining light for others.

When one, looking into a mirror, sees the image of the person behind him, he turns instantly and gazes upon the person whose image was reflected. So, if others see Christ's image in you, they take knowledge that you have been with Jesus, and look unto him whom you are personating and reflecting.

Christ, the express image of the Father, could say, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." Happy are we if we can have it said of us, "He that hath seen him hath seen a miniature of the infinite Saviour." E. W. C.

What Is God Like?

THURSDAY, May 17. Ps. 51 : 17. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." Dan Crawford and Mary Slessor of Calabar both testify that nobody in Africa has to be persuaded there is a God—they all believe in him. And yet they found no tribe that knew what God is like, though some thought they knew. And they found no tribe that did not want to know what God is like. The missionary's work is easy so far as argument is concerned. He does not have to prove that God is. He has only to show what God is, what he is like.

There are two direct methods of answering the question, What is God like? One is by considering what God says about himself, if he says anything; the other method is by looking at God's character portrait, if any such is known. We believe that Jesus Christ is the character portrait of God. He claimed to be just that, and those who knew him best honored the claim. It remains for us to look closely at the portrait, fix in our minds its essential features, and then ascertain that God's description of himself fairly fits the picture.

Here are Scriptures which describe God in the language and from the lips of men who believe that when they speak God is speaking through them. If this be our God, the God of rational faith, then he must be like Jesus, so like him that the two Testaments fit into one another like a ball into a socket, or like the two wings of a hinge. In other words if Jehovah of the Old Testament be our God, he must be like the God we discern and adore in that lonely, lovely Man Christ Jesus, whose words and deeds were the wonder and glory of his age, and of all ages since.

Does this likeness exist? Compare these words in the Pentitential Psalm with the character of Jesus, with his attitude toward the broken-hearted, with his beatitudes and indeed with the whole sum of his teaching with reference to contrition, and see how perfectly they correspond. When we see that the God of the Old Testament is the Christ of the New, it is all plain—they are alike because they are one and the same. We can not turn away from Jehovah, for his other name is Jesus. C. C. A.

The Redeemer Liveth

FRIDAY, May 18. Job 19 : 25, 27. "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another." Job's wish that this saying of his, which seems to give the interpreters needless trouble, were graven in the rock has been fulfilled in innumerable instances. From the monuments over the graves of many Christians this beautiful sentiment of them that have died in the Lord greets us.

There is not a single blessing that we have received, or enjoy now, or hope for, in this miserable life but is traceable to this fact: My Redeemer liveth. The consciousness of this fact lifts the believer not over passing annoyances and slight troubles, but makes him walk with intrepid heart into the very abode of corruption. One might even discern a note of defiance in these heroic words of the famous sufferer. It is as if he were saying: "O death, where is thy sting?"

Job was daily observing the progress of the decay which the terrible disease was working upon his physical organism. He saw himself wasting away. Complete dissolution seemed his inevitable fate. He accepts this appalling prospect, because he is sure that after the dissolution there will be a restoration. The loathsome vision before him will be exchanged for the glorious vision of God. He will see him; and not only that—he will have eyes to see him with. He, the same Job that is now dying inchwise, as it were, will see him, "not another," not a different Job. With his resurrection body his personal identity will be restored to him.

And all this he states as an undoubted fact of his believing knowledge, because on the day when time terminates there will be One standing above the dust of corruption. His voice will ring through the sepulchers of the earth, summoning into existence by his mighty word beings that seemed to have been destroyed irreparably. Gladly that voice will be obeyed by the saints sleeping in their graves. He who was the Firstfruit of them that slept is calling his brethren to the great reunion in the Father's home. His own resurrection foreshadowed theirs, and theirs is a necessary result of his redeeming work. In fact, it is the last act in his activity as Redeemer that he brings them out of the chambers of death into the eternal hall of glory, and puts an end to their dying. Upon the wings of this text may our soul soar heavenward in our dying hour, and at our graves let our friends proclaim this as our dying trust: "I know that my Redeemer liveth!" W. H. T. D.

The Personal Touch

SATURDAY, May 19. Matt. 8 : 3. "And Jesus put forth his hand and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean." A friend was invited to view a cabinet of jewels. The owner first took out a handful of opals, but the friend could see nothing remarkable about them. They were dull and sombre. The owner closed his hand and for a while showed the brilliant, sparkling diamonds and a drawer full of rubies, sapphires and emeralds. Then he opened his hand holding the opals, which were now transformed, glowing with the brilliance of diamonds, burning with lustrous light and beauty.

"How did it happen?"

"This change comes only by the human touch."

Jesus' personal touch transforms diseased bodies into life and health. When there were too many for him to reach, they touched him, even to the hem of his garment. Personal contact with the lives of suffering humanity is the best way to express sympathy and help. Jesus sought to save individuals rather than masses of men. We should follow his example, as well as that of the apostle. Andrew personally touched his brother Peter and led him to Jesus. Philip influenced Nathanael; Paul for three years at Ephesus warned every man night and day with tears. The personal touch is the secret of the early progress of Christianity. "Ye are my witnesses." Have you put yourself in contact with a single soul, witnessing for Christ, or have you omitted to tell your brother, your child, your friend, of Jesus and his love? E. W. C.

Looking Straight Ahead

ALL of us need a new baptism of courage and confidence these days. Confidence in God, who has bestowed upon this nation blessings in such abundance in the past; and courage in our own hearts, to go forward with the work that lies before us.

It is a waste of time to figure out, as many are now doing, the causes that have combined to involve us in this war. The vital fact now to be accepted and faced is that we are at war.

But our resources are incalculable. While Europe is bankrupt and less than half fed, we have abundance and to spare. Our crops, poor last year and heavily drawn upon, will this year be abundant, if the promise of the spring holds good. More land will be cultivated by millions of acres than ever before. We shall raise food enough for half the globe, if nature fulfils our expectations and if the energy of our agricultural crusade be intelligently applied. God will send his sunshine and his rain, and will so bless our labors that there will be no danger of famine in the land. But we must work hard on the farms and gardens, and do our full share toward raising a crop at least twenty-five per cent. bigger than that of last year, and a great deal bigger if possible, as much of it will be needed to fight the famine which seems inevitable in Europe. Even if the predictions that the war will end this year should prove true, the need will be great, as it will be impossible for the Old World to reorganize its agricultural and other industries for a long time to come.

If we are rightly appreciative of our blessings, we will not borrow trouble. One form of doing this is by giving way to a hysterical economy. The Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense has issued a judicious warning against the fostering of that morbid view of patriotism which expresses itself in indiscriminate economy, resulting in the slowing down of community and industrial activities, thus inviting the very conditions we should strive to avoid. The best service we can render to the nation and to ourselves is to keep business normal, and to energize all of our industries, collectively and individually; to keep labor fully employed and to have all the wheels of the economic machine going at full speed. We will then be far stronger and in better trim to meet whatever trials may await us.

"Speed the plow" in the furrow, sow plentifully, do all we can to help the soil yield two ears of corn where one grew before, and to bring forth in abundance food for man and beast. And when the song of the reaper is heard in the land, may it be a strain of gratitude to him who is able to cause us to celebrate the double blessing of Peace and Plenty.

A World-Wide Preacher

VERY many will read with regret the news that the Rev. Dr. John Henry Jowett is to give up his American pastorate next spring and return to London, having accepted the call to Westminster Congregational Chapel. For six years he has been the honored pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York, but his real congregation has been nationwide. During the larger part of his American ministry he has preached the Gospel to great audiences through the pages of the Christian Herald. Few preachers in this generation have so won the hearts of their audiences, and rarely have the truths of the Gospel and the beauty of the Christian life been so attractively and successfully presented. His sermons are discourses of the highest spiritual order, and in the printed page they have been helpful to many who never had the opportunity to hear him speak in his church. When he goes he will carry with him the grateful remembrances of a host of friends, many of whom have been strengthened in the Christian life by his faithful ministry. He will not, however, be a stranger to the readers of this journal, for we hope to print his sermons frequently, even in his new field. He is a preacher of whom it may be said, as was once remarked of the late Dr. Joseph Parker, that "the seats of his auditorium extended from the Rocky Mountains to the Himalayas." Go where he will, his audience will be world-wide.

Which Way Are You Pulling?

THERE are in the world two sets of forces—one set pulling down, the other pulling up—one pulling forward, the other backward.

The homes, the churches, the schools, the ethical societies, art museums, higher drama, social settlements, are pulling men and women up, putting more light and joy in human lives, and increasing the sum total of the world's good and happiness.

Arrayed against these benign agencies are the forces of greed, appetite and passion, which through all time have pulled downward and backward.

Every man and woman is influenced more or less by both these forces. We yield more often and more readily to the one with which we are most in sympathy. Habits, purposes, ideals, associations, all are tendrils, or tentacles, by which one or the other of these forces gains hold on us.

As times change these forces take new shapes, new phases, new names; but through all the ages and under all conditions they are substantially the same—the one animated by love, the other by greed; the one working for the great brotherhood in which there is a common glory and a common joy, the glory of good deeds and the joy of noble self-respect; the other animated by a selfishness that is ready to see humanity wrecked, if it can only "put more money in the purse" and attain to the gratification of the lust for place and power.

We are not only influenced by these forces, but we blend into them and become part of them. Our every action is a force for good or evil in some other soul.

It is a ceaseless, unending battle, of vital and far-reaching results; and it is the first business of every one to ask himself the question:

"Which side am I on? Am I with the forces which diminish the sum total of human joy and dwarf the world's manhood, or am I on the side of those forces which flood the world with gladness and kindness and promote the character that is the basis of all true civilization and advancement?"

No matter how unimportant you may seem to be in the world's affairs, you are a vital force pulling one way or the other.

Which way are you pulling?

Honor to Whom Honor

THE farmer is in service this year for the nation and the world. The President has designated the man who tills the soil as a factor of vital importance in the great struggle upon which the country has entered. If his labor be so important an essential, and if he be indeed a soldier of the nation, then we would suggest that the farmer who does distinguished service in the furrows be duly honored by the nation as he deserves.

In fifteen years the farmer has raised the average crop per acre from fifteen to more than fifty bushels. He can do better even than that. Some few states now honor these heroes of the farm. Why should not our Department of Agriculture in Washington institute this year a great national farming contest, on a basis which would give an equal chance to the smaller and the larger agriculturists—to the holder of a five-acre plot or the possessor of a tillable domain so big that it would take him a whole day to ride around it?

It would greatly stimulate effort and elevate the oldest of all industries immensely, were the Federal government or the states, or both, to institute a system of awards for successful agriculturists this year. We give the suggestion for what it is worth. This is the day of the farmer. Let us honor him accordingly.

We Need the Evangelists

ANYONE looking at the great crowds that fill the surface cars, the subways, and the thoroughfares leading to Evangelist Sunday's big tabernacle in New York, must be struck with the contrast between that mighty multitude, converging from all sides to a common center, and the thin stream of humanity that takes its way to the average church service. Wherein lies the difference, and why should there be a difference so tremendous?

Here, surely, is food for reflection! The evangelist preaches Christ, and so do the churches, though the presentation may differ in emphasis, in form, in diction and in many other details. He preaches repentance, confession of faith and public acceptance of Jesus as a personal Saviour. Do the churches do this in direct and unmistakable language? He preaches open renunciation of sin and the devil and all his works. It cannot be urged that the churches always put due emphasis on these things, or on many others that are the very essence of the evangelist's teachings. He calls the besetting sins of the people by their right names, and excoriates them in language that would make a staid and conservative audience of worshipers rouse themselves and wince at the terrible bitterness of the true indictment. Assuredly he would be a bold minister who would disturb the serene placidity of his congregation by such methods.

The mission of the evangelist is to tell the whole truth about sin and death and judgment, and also to set before men the alternative of salvation and acceptance and the divine gift of eternal life through an ever-living Redeemer. He may tell it in any language he chooses, either classic or vernacular; the main point is that he tells it fully and truthfully, and trusts to the great Searcher of hearts to make it sink into the consciousness of men and women, that it may become the means, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, of leading them to abandon sin and begin the new life.

Yes, we need the evangelists. They have a special mission to arouse the sinners who are impervious to the formal, easygoing doctrine of the churches. And whether the messenger clothe his message in words of living fire or in phrases that win by persuasive mildness, makes no difference. Moody and Finney and Torrey placed emphasis on the law and its punishments; others, and probably the majority, have dwelt more upon the Gospel of free grace; but both kinds are needed.

The Lullaby

THE soft notes of a simple song low sung float through the twilight. A mother is rocking in her arms a little child and singing it to sleep.

Now and then the voice falters a little or loses the key somewhat, for it is a voice more used to solid words than to song. But somehow its uneven measures spread throughout the twilight world a light more golden than that which glows in the western sky.

Music has its laws, and the lullaby does not always conform to them. Yet who, hearing the lulling of a little child to sleep, is not silenced of all criticism? It is one of the things outside the realm of critic or cynic; it is of too divine kinship for these.

The meaning of music goes deep. It is the universal language of the soul. Where speech fails, song is only beginning. Music can make men's hearts as steel in the face of battle, when thousands are to be stricken down and trampled into the earth, or it can melt these same hearts to tender love and make them tremble at a sweetheart's whisper. Music can cleanse the soul for worship, or it can deprave for the vilest orgies. It uplifts, and it debases; it inspires to the high, the sweet, the true, and it deadens to the gross and low, the vicious and the heartless. Freedom and love and fidelity and praise—words that illumine all language—would be meaningless and dead but for the spirit instilled into them by song.

No other music sinks so deep into the soul as the lullaby; no other sound so seems to sway the heart of man. On pinions that defy the rush of years and not to be outstripped by the fastest pace of life, the luminous spirit of the mother-love ever hovers over us.

Sacred among the memories of the years is a song which one day was our inspiration to sweetest dreams. It matters not how faintly that song echoes—how distance dims that inspiration—there is enough to fill our hearts with higher hopes for yet unborn years.

Such are the little things of life that never leave us, clinging around all that is best within us in an unceasing influence to hold us true to the path of right.

We little know, dreaming through the sunkissed stretches of childhood, how this simple song and that gentle word shall some day be our most trusted guides through wilderness and storm.

The pageants of the world pass quickly by. The glories of the age are born and fade again to nothingness. Each man's view of life is as a glance through a fast-revolving kaleidoscope; we strain and struggle at this endless game, success; our fancies born of last night's dreams have died of age before the sun has set; our loftiest strivings of today are tomorrow all forgot, and we, like careless children, soon are steeped in some new scheme of power or gain or pleasure.

How is it, then, that through all the changing years we still hold some ideals unchanged?

The mother-song floating through the twilight answers.

It is a spirit voice of all the best impulses that have been, even from the beginning. It blessed the breeze that scented Eden's grove, and ever since its blessing has been borne into every nook and corner of the habited world.

For among our changes manifold and great one thing remains unchanged. With all our varying moods and fleeting fancies, our restless building up and impatient tearing down, we have, as was in the beginning, has been through all the ages and shall be forevermore, the measureless blessing of a mother's love and the undying sweetness of the lullaby.

Two Caves in Tennessee

THE two historic caves known as Arch Cave and Bone Cave in Van Buren County, Tennessee, are being developed, and incidents of the past are being recalled. During the Civil War Confederate recruits were said to have been secretly mustered into service in Arch Cave while Federal troops scoured the territory overhead. This splendid cavern has one room with a level floor 60 feet wide and 300 feet long, and is surrounded by a symmetrical oval dome. People come from all parts of the world to see our Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. In olden times the people hid themselves in these caverns of the earth as places of safety. The early Christians, in their bloody persecutions, often resorted to such places. The recruiting of troops in the Arch Cave of Tennessee, in which they had hidden, calls to mind the refuge that David took in a cave, and of the recruiting of forces he there carried on: "David therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave Adullam; . . . and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them; and there were with him about four hundred men." (I Sam. 22 : 1, 2.)

Old Quaker Woman Preaches

MRS. MARY GODDARD, who is 107 years old, has been one of the preachers at the Quaker Church at Brunswick, Maine, which church is 150 years old. She has been one of the preachers, for the Quakers do not believe in an ordained ministry. Any member of the society moved to speak in the open meeting has the right to do so. The Gospel she has preached has been good, old-fashioned, orthodox truth, the exactness of right living, the warmest motherly love, and the most active practical benevolence. There has never been a time in the history of this country when the Quakers numbered over 200,000. It was impossible for many reasons for the society to grow to large numbers. But when it came to intelligent, tireless industry in the home, on the farm, in the shop, store or office, when it came to a question of truthfulness of word or honesty of action, when it came to close spiritual communion with God, to helping the poor, to conscientiously maintaining peace and fighting the drink traffic, then "Friend Quaker" could be relied upon. George Fox founded the first Society of Friends in 1648. In 1827 Elias Hicks took a large number away from the parent society and organized a new branch popularly known as Hicksite Quakers. They were counted as heretical. The central idea of the Quakers has been the light of Christ in man, and they base it on this passage: "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men." (John 1 : 4.)

Hid Lobster Under Vest

THE fable of the Spartan youth who hid a stolen fox under his robe and held it there till it had eaten out his vitals, had a faint counterpart in Paris the other day when a man entered a fish-store and stealing a lobster stuffed it up under his vest. The lobster immediately "got busy.". The man, not having the nerve of the Spartan youth, with groans of agony began to disrobe in the street. He was in the act of removing his vest when a policeman, presuming from his actions that he was crazy, arrested him and was going to take him to a court for inquiry as to his sanity. But when he took hold of the man, the lobster being angry and having no respect for authority, took hold of the policeman. The man was taken to the criminal court, where he said he did not know the lobster was alive. Though guilty, he was released, as he is the father of nine children, four of whom are soldiers in the army. Stolen foxes and lobsters have teeth and claws with which they wound and destroy those who try to conceal them. A thing dishonestly gotten never helps a man; it always hurts him, and if persisted in will destroy him morally. It is as good policy as it is good principle to obey this injunction: "Provide things honest in the sight of all men." (Rom. 12 : 17.)

Anchors That Hold

IT is as important that the anchor be made strong as it is that the cables be made strong that are to hold the ship to it in the storm. The anchors used in the United States navy and in most of the merchant ships are made of cast steel, and weigh from 200 to 20,000 pounds, according to necessity. They undergo the minutest inspection; they are dropped from lofty heights, and hammered, to detect even the hint of a flaw, and at the last, before they are used, they are subjected to a machine which pulls on them more than is expected of them in the storm. One weighing 20,000 pounds stood the test the other day, and will go with one of Uncle Sam's huge dreadnoughts. It is very important to have the anchor well tested that is to hold the human soul in the stormy sea of time and amidst the billows of eternity. With what blessed assurance the fathers and mothers of Israel, sailing over life's troubled main, approach the home port ready to drop anchor and say, "Saved, and saved forever!" And with what comfort and hope the younger ones set their sails to the breeze for a happy, profitable, safe voyage over the sea of time to the harbor of heaven! This sure faith in Christ gives speed, joy, glory, heaven and loved ones to the voyage. "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus." (Heb. 6 : 19, 20.)

Sun's Rays Kindle Fire

A GOLDFISH bowl in a St. Louis home placed at the front window in the direct rays of the sun concentrated those rays so completely in one spot in a pillow on a bed nearby that it set it on fire, and had not timely assistance been instantly rendered, a serious conflagration might have been the result. There is everything in the relation that is sustained to the sun. If proper, there will come beauty, life and growth; if improper, there will come destruction. The very sun that gave beauty and life to the face of the flower growing in the window, that brought joy to the goldfish in the glass bowl, that imparted health to the invalid in the armchair, set fire to the pillow and would have destroyed the house, because there was a wrong adjustment to it. The sun in the Scriptures is used as the symbol of God. A proper relation of ourselves to Him by faith will bring beauty, life, growth, love; while a wrong adjustment of our relation will bring destruction. This severe fact is too often overlooked in these times of doubt and tenderness in handling wrong, and cowardice in rebuking it. It is wise, yea necessary, for us to have the proper relation to God through a crucified Redeemer, if we would escape the fearful experience mentioned in the old dispensation and thus repeated in the new in the apostle's letter: "Our God is a consuming fire." (Heb. 12 : 29.)

Most Fragrant Wild Flower

THE American Botanist has asked its readers to indicate which American wild flower they consider most fragrant. In New England a majority gave first choice to the pink azalea, with the white water lily second. Many voted for the trailing arbutus. Other favorites for first place were the partridge-berry, the common locust, the horned bladderwort, the yellow jessamine and some of the magnolias. The question of beauty, as that of fragrance, is a difficult thing to determine. Some of the most beautiful and fragrant flowers God has made for few eyes beside his own, but he has made them to beautify and perfume this planet of ours for our home. Christ thus expresses his appreciation of flowers: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." (Matt. 6 : 28, 29.)

Helping Himself

A SHORT time ago a girl fainted while testifying in Judge Gorter's court in Baltimore, Md., and was taken into the judge's private office. A serious-looking man in the court room said he was a physician and rushed to the girl as first aid to the injured. He felt her pulse, looked at her tongue, gave instructions for her treatment, and said there was nothing serious, that she would be all right soon, and left the court house. When the court was adjourned and the judge was getting ready to go home, he could not find his overcoat. Of course not, for the fellow who had played the rôle of the physician so perfectly was in reality a thief, and had taken the garment several hours before. There is no end to the devices of men to get something for nothing. The pastor of one of the richest churches in New York, in beginning a sermon, said: "This is a fearfully stormy night, and there are only a few out, but it is my rule not to shift themes or give a little extemporaneous talk and dismiss, as is the custom on such nights. I will give you the careful message I have prepared, for I know that those who came out such a night as this came for something." And so they had; for when the pastor at the close of his sermon said, "Let us pray," a handsome, well-dressed man who sat in the Amen corner left the church while the preacher's eyes were closed in prayer and the people had their heads over the back of the seats. He took the preacher's fine overcoat and left by the rear door. He had come for something that stormy night and got it. Thieves even go up into the courts of justice or the temples of the living God to break this law: "Thou shalt not steal." (Ex. 20 : 15.)

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, orphan daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement, and a month later a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once his father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first two months of the honeymoon were spent in finding a home and trying to live in a flat on $15 a week. This problem was soon solved to Helen's satisfaction by means of an account at the grocery, which she opened without Burke's knowledge. The explosion came with the first batch of grocer's bills. Burke then instructed Helen in the mysteries of bookkeeping, and at the same time tried to polish the manners of his rustic wife. One night Burke received a visit from his friend Dr. Gleason, a traveler and archeologist, and Helen did her best to entertain their guest; but her efforts only served to mortify her husband and accentuate the gulf that separated her from the refined society in which he had been reared.

CHAPTER VIII

DIVERGING WAYS

OF course the inevitable happened. However near two roads may be at the start, if they diverge ever so slightly and keep straight ahead, there is bound to be in time all the world between them.

In the case of Burke and Helen, their roads never started together at all: they merely crossed; and at the crossing came the wedding. They were miles apart at the start—miles apart in tastes, traditions, and environment. In one respect only were they alike: undisciplined self-indulgence—a likeness that meant only added differences when it came to the crossing; and that made it all the more nearly impossible to merge those two diverging roads into one wide way leading straight on to wedded happiness.

All his life Burke had consulted no one's will but his own. It was not easy now to walk when he wanted to sit still, nor to talk when he wanted to read; especially as the one who wanted him to walk and to talk happened to be a wilful young person who all her life had been in the habit of walking and talking when she wanted to.

Burke, accustomed from babyhood to leaving his belongings wherever he happened to drop them, was first surprised and then angry that he did not find them magically restored to their proper places, as in the days of his boyhood and youth. Burke abhorred disorder. Helen, accustomed from her babyhood to being picked up after, easily drifted into the way of letting all things, both hers and his, lie as they were. It saved a great deal of work.

Even so simple a matter as the temperature of a sleeping-room had its difficulties. Burke liked air. He wanted the windows wide open. Helen, trained to think night air was damp and dangerous, wanted them shut. And when two people are sleepy, cross, and tired, it is appalling what a range of woe can lie in the mere opening and shutting of a window.

Burke was surprised, annoyed, and dismayed. Being unaccustomed to disappointments he did not know how to take them gracefully. This being married was not proving to be at all the sort of thing he had pictured to himself. He had supposed that life, married life, was to be a new wonder every day; an increasing delight every hour. It was neither. Living now was a matter of never-ending adjustment, self-sacrifice, and economy. And he hated them all. In spite of himself he was getting into debt, and he hated debt. It made a fellow feel cheap and mean.

Even Helen was not what he had thought she was. He was ashamed to own it, even to himself, but there was a good deal about Helen that he did not like. She was not careful about her appearance. She was actually almost untidy at times. He hated those loose, sloppy things she sometimes wore, and he abominated those curl-paper things in her hair. She was wilful and fretful, and she certainly did not know how to give a fellow a decent meal or a comfortable place to stay. For his part, he did not think a girl had any right to marry until she knew something about running a simple home.

Then there was her constant chatter. Was she not ever going to talk about anything but the silly little everyday happenings of her work? A fellow wanted to hear something, when he came home tired at night, besides complaints that the range didn't work, or that the grocer forgot his order, or that the money was out.

Why, Helen used to be good company, cheerful, often witty. Where were her old-time sparkle and radiance? Her talk now was a meaningless chatter of trivial things, or an irritating, wailing complaint of everything under the sun, chiefly revolving around the point of "how different everything was" from what she expected. As if he had not found some things different! That evidently was what marriage was—different. But talking about it all the time did not help any.

Couldn't she read? But, then, if she did read, it would be only the newspaper account of the latest murder; and then she would want to talk about that. She never read anything worth while.

And it was for this, this being married to Helen, that he had given up so much: dad, his home, everything. She didn't appreciate it—Helen didn't. She did not rightly estimate what he was being made to suffer.

That there was any especial meaning in all this that he himself should take to heart—that there was any course open to him but righteous discontent and rebellion—never occurred to Burke. His training of frosted cakes and toy shotguns had taught him nothing of the traditional "two bears," "bear" and "forbear." The marriage ceremony had not meant to him "to be patient, tender, and sympathetic." It had meant the "I will" of self-assertion, not the "I will" of self-discipline. That Helen ought to change many of her traits and habits he was convinced. That there might be some in himself that needed changing, or that the mere fact of his having married Helen might have entailed upon himself certain obligations as to making the best of what he had deliberately chosen, did not once occur to him.

As for Helen—Helen was facing her own disillusions. She was not trying now to be the daintily gowned wife welcoming her husband to a well-kept home. She had long since decided that that was impossible—on sixty dollars a month. She was tired of being a martyr wife. Even the laurel wreath of praise had lost its allurement: she would not get it, probably, even if she earned it; and, anyway, she would be dead from trying to get it. And for her part she would rather have some fun while she was living.

But she wasn't having any fun. Things were so different. Everything was different. She had not supposed being married was like this: one long grind of housework from morning till night and for a man who did not care. And Burke did not care—now. Once, the first thing he wanted when he came into the house was a kiss and a word from her. Now he wanted his dinner. And he was so fussy, too! She could get along with cold things; but he wanted hot ones, and lots of them. And he always wanted finger-bowls and lots of spoons, and everything fixed just so on the table, too. He said it wasn't that he wanted "style." It was just that he wanted things decent. As if she hadn't had things decent herself—and without all that fuss and clutter!

After dinner he never wanted to talk now, or to go for a walk. He just wanted to read or study. He said he was studying; something about his work. As if once he would have cared more for any old work than for her!

And she was so lonely! There was nobody now for her to be with. Mrs. Jones had moved away, and there were never any callers now. She had returned every one of the calls she had had from Burke's fine friends. She had put on her new red dress and her best hat with the pink roses; and she had tried to be just as bright and entertaining as she knew how to be. But they never came again, so of course she could not go to see them. She had gone, once or twice. But Burke said she must not do that. It was not proper to return your own calls. If they wanted to see her they would come themselves. But they never came. Probably, anyhow, they did not want to see her; and that was the trouble. Not that she cared! They were a "stuck-up" lot, anyway; and she was just as good as they were. She had told one woman so, once—the woman that carried her eyeglasses on the end of a little stick and stared. That woman always had made her mad. So it was just as well, perhaps, that they did not come any more, after all. Burke was ashamed of her, anyway, when they did come. She knew that. He did not like anything she did nowadays. He was always telling her he did wish she would stop saying "you was," or holding her fork like that, or making so much noise eating soup, and a dozen other things. As if nobody in the house had a right to do anything but his way!

It had been so different at home! There everything she did was just right. And she was never lonely. There were the parties and the frolics and the sleigh-rides, and the girls running in all the time, and the boys every evening on the porch, or in the parlor, or taking her buggy-riding. Nothing there was ever complete without her. While here—Well, who supposed being married meant working like a slave all day, and being cooped up all the evening with a man whose nose was buried in a book, and who scarcely spoke to you!

And there was the money. Burke acted, for all the world, as if he thought she ate money, and ate it whether she was hungry or not, just to spite him. As if she didn't squeeze every penny till it fairly shrieked, now; and as if anybody could make ten dollars a week go further than she did! To be sure, at first she had been silly and extravagant, running up bills, and borrowing of Mrs. Jones, as she did. And of course she was a little unreasonable and childish about keeping that account-book. But that was only at the first, when she was quite ignorant and inexperienced. It was very different now. She kept a cash account, and most of the time it came right. How she wished she had an allowance, though! But Burke utterly refused to give her that. Said she'd be extravagant and spend it all the first day. As if she had not learned better than that by bitter experience! And as if anything could be worse than the way they were trying to get along now, with her teasing for money all the time, and him insisting on seeing the bills, and then asking how they could manage to eat so many eggs, and saying he should think she used butter to oil the floors with. He didn't see how it could go so fast any other way!

And wasn't he always telling her she did not manage right? And didn't he give her particular fits one day and an awful lecture on wastefulness, just because he happened to find half a loaf of moldy bread in the jar? Just as if he didn't spend something—and a good big something, too! Yet he flew into fits over a bit of moldy bread of hers.

To be sure, when she cried, he called himself a brute, and said he didn't mean it, and it was only because he hated so to have her pinching and saving all the time that it made him mad—raving mad. Just as if she was to blame that they did not have any money!

But she was to blame, of course, in a way. If it had not been for her, he

A MOTHER'S SONG

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

God gave me—you!
He took a bit of heaven's deepest blue
To tint your eyes;
He touched your hair with sunlight's deathless gold,
And all the roses that your hands could hold
(Pink roses sweet with early morning dew)
He wove into your face, your dimpled hands.
And then he laughed, for, oh, God understands
He gave me—you!

When you are grown what will your future be?
If I could only keep you safe with me,
If I could only ever hold you pressed
Against my breast!
And yet the world, though it be hard and gray,
Will brighten if you smile along the way.
(When you were born God's messenger passed through The silent room, and left a smile for you!)

I hold you close; I sing a bit, and pray,
For me each God-sent dawn brings Mother's Day!

Billy Sunday on "Mother"

A Sermon Preached in the New York Tabernacle April 27*

TEXT—Ex. 2:9. "Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages."

THE story of Moses is among the most fascinating in the world, because he came into the world with the sentence of death upon him. The sword of Pharaoh waited for him, for the king had ordered all the male children of the Israelites put to death, and the female children kept alive.

The battle of right against might was fought right at his cradle, for the mother determined to save the child, and God was with her, and when God is with a mother she always wins.

Then she planned to make an ark and leave Miriam to guard it.

I imagine the plans for that ark were made in heaven. God had mighty plans for that child's life. The world today feels the influence of the great life that was saved.

I imagine the composition of that ark was carefully watched, so that nothing faulty went into the weaving of it.

Oh, if we were as careful of the books our children read, of the places they go to, as that mother was of the materials of the ark, there would not be so many young men going wrong, and most of our prostitutes would not be girls of seventeen to twenty-one.

But very often in order to make a stand you may have to slap some neighbor in the face, and we don't want to do that.

The weaving of the ark was a double labor of care and love, because of the precious cargo. That cargo was more precious than the crown jewels of Egypt.

There came the last night that the baby was to be at home, before it was placed in the ark with Miriam to guard it.

It was something like the last night the little white casket may have lain in your home. There may be now whips and tops and shoes and toys that will never be used again. That night the mother could not sleep, though perhaps others slept. All night she prayed God to protect her baby.

People have asked me how angels employ their time. I think some of them were busy keeping Pharaoh's soldiers away after the ark was placed among the reeds.

Then Moses' mother went back to the fields and brickyards and bared her back to the lash of the task-master.

She had done her prayerful best. God never fails the man or woman who does her prayerful best. God was on the job.

SHE knew, perhaps, that God would help her, but she never dreamed that the daughter of great Pharaoh would be the rescuer of her child. But it was no harder for God to move the daughter of Pharaoh than to move the mother herself.

I imagine the angels were busy herding the crocodiles of the Nile to the other side, while the baby rocked in that cradle among the reeds!

Down came Pharaoh's daughter to bathe. The ark was found. It was opened. Then appeared the baby, sucking its thumb and kicking up its heels just as you did when you were a kid.

And then the baby wept. I think perhaps an angel stood by and pinched it at the proper moment. Those tears were the jewels with which God ransomed Israel, for Pharaoh's daughter had a woman's heart. The tears washed away the fact that the child was a Hebrew. I tell you, when a woman's heart and a baby's tears meet, the devil gets cold feet.

Don't forget Miriam. Up she races to the princess. "Shall I get one of the Hebrew women to nurse it for you?" I can see her little bare feet scurrying along the dusty road.

Then back she comes with the mother. And behold! The mother comes back, takes her own child—I think maybe the princess noticed how quickly it stopped crying—and soon the mother hears that she is to leave the brickyards and take care of the child, and be paid Egyptian gold for what she'd rather do than anything else in the world!

I think that mother must have had some dispensation of grace to keep from dying of joy.

And how hilarious heaven must have been when the angels saw that Moses was back in his mother's arms!

Just notice how God does.

I'm going to heaven some day. God has arranged that all who believe in Jesus Christ and repent of their sins shall go.

And when I go the first one with whom I shake hands will be Jesus. Then I shall look up my mother. Then I am going to ask where the mother of Moses is, and I am going to find out from her how much Egyptian gold she got for taking care of her own child!

The first lesson of this is the lesson of a mother's pluck.

Fathers get blue, get discouraged, hit the booze, commit suicide. But mothers put up the bravest battle in the world, even if they manicure their fingers over the washboard to be ready when the landlord punches the door-bell on the first of the month.

A MOTHER hearing her baby scream rushed to the yard to see a snake wrapping itself around her child. She caught the snake by the tail, unwound it and whirled it above her head and pounded its head to pulp on a rock that lay near. Mothers are always brave.

The mother's work is above all else. To find the path of greatness don't go toward the throne, the White House, the bank, but toward the cradle. When Christ wanted to show who would be greatest in the kingdom of heaven he called a little child.

Robert Matthews
Secretary to Mr. Sunday and pianist at the tabernacle

There was not a college professor in Egypt that God would trust with the education of Moses. He put the lad back in his mother's arms.

I'm old-fashioned enough, old fogy enough to believe there are not enough devils in hell to tear a child out of the arms of a good mother.

Any kind of a stick will do for a daddy, but the mother has to be something to have the child amount to something.

What America or any land must have is good mothers. I'm sorry all the mothers are not good. If George Washington had had a mother like Happy Hooligan he'd be wearing a tin can for a hat.

Some one has said, "God couldn't be everywhere, so he gave us mothers." Ah, if all mothers were as they might be there would be none of those dirty, stinking hellholes known as saloons—they'd be out of business tomorrow.

If you keep the devil away from the children the devil will soon pack his grip and leave.

Two young men went to hear Bob Ingersoll in Chicago. One was a sympathizer with Bob, and said, "Well, Ingersoll cleaned up everything tonight, didn't leave anything." The other said, "Yes, he cleaned up everything except my old mother's religion—he didn't clean that up."

BEING a king or an emperor is small business compared to being a mother. To teach a child as it should be taught is greater than making an airplane or a submarine or a ship that will reach the north pole.

A friend of mine received a crystal as small as a pinhead, and was told that this crystal could give a green tinge to a hogshead of water. And often a single influence will affect a whole life.

Wait until the mountains of eternity are reached, and you will see the mothers in God's hall of fame. There are many men in our earthly hall of fame who will not be in God's because they were not Christians.

To plant a thought, to build a character, is better than building a sky-scraper. God has plans for your child as well as for Moses.

There is nothing to show that the mother of Moses got any help from the father. He may have stolen some of the twigs with which she was making the ark, and built a fire with them. A woman can't get help in building up her child to true manhood, if the father has no more backbone than a meat rind.

Often a mother is tempted to despair in training her child, when she tells him not to swear, and the father comes home cursing, when she tells him not to smoke cigarettes and the father smokes cigarettes.

But once when a fine building was going up a friend of mine wanted to find how a certain derrick was operated, and he found an old, spavined, rat-tailed, blind horse was the motive power. The horse did not know it was helping to erect one of the finest buildings in the land, and we do not always know what we are accomplishing.

The mother's office is God's right hand.

Well, when Moses grew up he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. He said, "I'm not your son—there is my mother." Had he accepted, he might have worn the royal robes of the Pharaohs and the crown of Egypt, but he could not have led the children of Israel to the promised land.

You can't go to heaven and hell both.

If he'd accepted, he would not now be Moses, but an Egyptian mummy. Down the aisle to your right, first cross-aisle to your left—last mummy—Moses.

But he didn't. He said, "Excuse me, please," to all the riches of Egypt. Where did he get the nerve? From his mother! He didn't inhale it from his daddy. Moses was learned, but he didn't have the big-head.

Sons are often what mothers make them. If all mothers did all they could the devil would bank his fires and hang crêpe on his door and hell would be for rent before Christmas.

It is possible for any mother who wants to, to send her boy to some college and have him come home a little dried-up, sneering infidel.

One of the great troubles with some of our colleges today is that they are filled up with a lot of God-forsaken, good-for-nothing infidel professors supported by the taxpayers of the State.

If I were on a school board there wouldn't be a teacher who wasn't a Christian.

There is no power that can raise to heaven or push down to hell like the influence of a mother. Pardon a personal illustration.

My father went off to the war four months before I was born. He never came back. I never saw his face. He sleeps beneath the palmetto trees of the south.

I have fought my own way in the world since I was six years old. Remember that when you wonder why I don't do better, and when some of my ways and idiosyncracies grate on your sensibilities.

Well, one evening mother said to us boys: "Boys, you will have to go out and cut some wood."

So we wrapped around our necks the mufflers she had made, and put our hands into the mittens she had knit.

We went out into the yard. We said: "We'll go if you watch us," for it was getting dark and we were just a little bit afraid.

And we dug into the snow and got out the snow-covered logs. We sawed them with a saw that was dull and we split them with an axe that was dull.

And mother—mother put a lamp in the window and watched us. And every once in a while we turned and saw her smile, and we were encouraged and kept on our work, till we had got two wheelbarrow loads of it, and she called us in.

Mother went home—last—June. [Mr. Sunday had a momentary struggle for self-control.] She didn't tell us. She went to bed seeming as well as ever, and when we came to call her for breakfast she was not there. The old house in which she had lived for seventy-three years was there, but the angels had come for mother.

And now mother is at the bright windows of heaven watching the fight I am making for God, home and native land, decency, sobriety and virtue, and there she will watch her boy so long as God gives me power, until the Lord shall say, "It is enough—come up higher!"

THE great singers are worth while, like Calve, Patti, Tetrazzini and Farrar—I used to hold Geraldine on my knee and give her candy when her father played baseball on the Philadelphia team—but you have never heard music unless you have heard a mother sing to a sick child when she didn't know whether that child was going to get well or would soon flutter out of her arms in death!

I like to think some of the great songs we shall love in heaven will be the mother songs of this world. For hell mourned when mother-love first flamed up in a woman's heart, and the mother must go down near death to bring her child to the world.

The darkest fact in hell is that there is no mother's love in hell—all is black, endless, bitter, irreconcilable hate, hate of your neighbors, hate of God, hate of your own folly and the devil you served, hate, hate, hate!

But, no matter how vile the child becomes, the mother loves it, under the hangman's noose even, for what her baby might have been!

Then a child is a trust. I believe Judas's mother might have been a giddy, godless, good-for-nothing woman who had no use for Christ and his teachings. I've talked with men in prisons who blamed their mothers. There are some men so rotten in character that the devil would duck an alley to avoid meeting them, and very often the wreck of their lives was in the lives of mothers who lived for the world, the flesh and the devil.

Two lads, one fourteen and one sixteen, heard my

"Son, get your slippers on!"

Oh, the mothers, the countless mothers that have said it to their little urchins who reach the home-roof at night with scratchy leather soles.

"Son, get your slippers on!"

It was the only way for little Indians not to scratch a floor before Neōlin Soles were made.

So get them Neōlin Soles, that don't scratch floors—that don't bruise furniture.

Get them Neōlin Soles. They don't even carry mud in the way that leather does.

And Neōlin Soles do wear. They do mean noticeable saving where there are little feet to shoe.

Pliant, springy, weight-light soles! Winter-proof, waterproof, grip-sure soles. And as for slipper-comfortable—! They need no breaking in.

saintly friend Bishop Thoburn—not all bishops are saintly—tell of the India mission field. They came home in enthusiasm to their mother, a professing Christian, and told her that their life ambition was settled—they wanted to preach the Gospel in India.

"Tut tut! get that out of your head!" she said. "Leave that to boys who haven't the chance you have. You, Fred, are to take papa's factory; and you, John, have the qualifications to take papa's bank. We've decided on that."

Nobody knew how it happened, but three days later the boys were bathing. The younger was seized with a cramp, the older went to his assistance, the younger grappled with him, and together they went down to the bottom of the pond, and did not come up. The other boys dived and dived and brought them up, locked in each other's arms.

They got a wagon, and laid the lads in it on grass, and covered them with grass and brush. They took lots on who should go to the door. One boy went. When the mother came out smiling, he said, "The boys are out here in the wagon," and ducked and ran.

She came out, thinking it was a joke. She came to the wagon, and said, "Come out of that, you rascals!" and then she uncovered them, saw the dead bodies, and screamed.

Don't make God speak to you or you'll stagger! Don't step in between God and his own! Maybe you won't be able to sleep. God took those children because they were fit for heaven; if they had been left they might not be.

Lastly, the mother's reward is great. Moses' mother has been drawing on God's payroll from that day to this, and her name is bright as ever. Get your name on God's payroll.

Think of the reward earned by Hannah, and by Abraham's mother, and Daniel's mother, and the mother of the Lord. There is a story of an angel that visited the earth, and wished to take back to glory a worthy treasure. It took some flowers, and the smile of a child, and a mother's love, but all save the mother's love was faded in the journey, and the angel bore that love within the gates to be admired by the hosts in glory.

Billy Sunday Preaches to Men

ON the second night of the Sunday campaign, as the great audience was singing "Brighten the Corner," Mr. Rodeheaver heard the shrill treble of a childish voice and asked the little fellow to stand in his place and sing the chorus alone. He sang in a sweet, clear voice that carried to every corner of the great auditorium. On Friday night, April 27, after the sermon printed on the preceding page, this little six-year-old boy, carried in his father's arms, was the first trail-hitter, and there were 606 others.

On Wednesday evening, April 25, Evangelist J. Wilbur Chapman was introduced by Mr. Sunday as the man who gave him his start. Mr. Chapman, in a short appreciation of Mr. Sunday, brought the tabernacle audience to enthusiastic applause by saying that if it was true that he had had anything to do in starting Mr. Sunday on his great mission, it was the best thing he ever did. He said: "I know how true he is, I know how sincere he is; I also know with you how great he is. Every drop of blood in his body has been beating for Jesus Christ. When God has all there is of a man he can make him great."

At the first Sunday morning service in the tabernacle on April 29, an audience of about 8,000 yielded 435 trail-hitters. The cooperating churches were holding services as usual. In the afternoon and evening Mr. Sunday preached his sermon "Chickens come Home to Roost." Over 20,000 men heard the address in the afternoon, of whom 1,062 hit the trail, while out of 16,000 at night 1,283 went forward. This address for men only was a scathing arraignment of the sins that damn a man's life, and through his life the lives of all who must associate with him. The special attacks were upon profanity and that thing called personal liberty under which so many men attempt to hide unworthy living. At the afternoon service there was a large delegation of men from the Navy. Rody directed the ushers to seat them on the platform with the choir, and as the sailor men swung up in perfect files the great audience of citizens applauded vigorously. Rody turned to the crowd and said, "A whole lot of you fellows would look well in that uniform." Then the applause was deafening. Rody asked the sailors to stand, and when they told him that their favorite song was the "Star Spangled Banner," the applause broke out again.

On Sunday morning Mr. Sunday based upon the text, "Where there is no vision the people perish," a ringing call to Christians everywhere to raise their eyes from the petty things of ordinary living, to get the vision of Jesus Christ, and to follow him into service.

The announced plans for Sunday, May 6, included a great meeting for women at the New York Hippodrome at 3 P. M., to be addressed by Mrs. Sunday.

would be living at home with all the money he wanted. Sometimes it came to her with sickening force that maybe Burke was thinking that, too. Was he? Could it be that he was sorry he had married her? Very well—her chin came up proudly. He need not stay if he did not want to. He could go. But the chin was not so high, now—he was all there was. She had nobody but Burke now. Could it be— —

She believed she would ask Dr. Gleason some time. She liked the doctor. He had been there several times now, and she felt real well acquainted with him. Perhaps he would know. But, after all, she was not going to worry. She did not believe that really Burke wished he had not married her. It was only that he was tired and fretted with his work. It would be better by and by, when he had got ahead a little. And of course he would get ahead. They would not always have to live like this!

It was in March that Burke came home to dinner one evening with a radiant face, yet with an air of worried excitement.

"It's dad. He's sent for me," he explained, in answer to his wife's questions.

"Sent for you!"

"Yes. He isn't very well, Brett says. He wants to see me."

"Humph! After all this time! I wouldn't go a step if I was you."

"Helen! Not go to my father?"

Helen quaked a little under the fire in her husband's eyes; but she held her ground.

"I don't care. He's treated you like dirt. You know he has."

"I know he's sick and has sent for me. And I know I'm going to him. That's enough for me to know—at present," retorted the man, getting to his feet, and leaving his dinner almost untasted.

Half an hour later he appeared before her, freshly shaved, and in the radiant good humor that seems to follow a bath and fresh garments as a natural consequence. "Come, chicken, give us a kiss," he cried gayly; "and don't sit up for me: I may be late."

"My, but ain't we fixed up!" pouted Helen jealously. "I should think you was going to see your best girl."

"I am," laughed Burke boyishly. "Dad was my best girl—till I got you. Good-by! I'm off."

"Good-by." Helen's lips still pouted, and her eyes burned somberly as she sat back in her chair.

Kind Hearts

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

I REMEMBER writing in my copybook when I was a small girl in primary school—writing carefully and diligently with my tongue thrust between my teeth and my pen held just so. One's copybook was a very important part of primary school, and a blot or a blurred line on the white surface made one's heart ache brokenly. It also made one's mark in penmanship shoot down in a most sickening manner from the bewildering pinnacle of A to the just-passing mark C.

I scarcely paid heed to the lofty sentiments that I copied with cramped fingers and unwavering eyes. They were, after all, of scant importance. The really vital issue was that the writing should be good—fine on the up strokes and black and wide on the down strokes. The proverbs and poems and texts that I copied were only words to me—words to be written neatly, with a flourish or two, on a white page.

Many times, perhaps a hundred times, taking great pains with the quotation marks and the capital letters, I inscribed a certain verse in my book.

"Kind hearts," it ran, "are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

It was—it still is—a popular verse with teachers who favor copybooks. And yet I wonder how many round-eyed little children realize the meaning of the words? I copied the verse perhaps a hundred times, but only a few months ago did I fully understand the truth and the beauty and the logic of what I had written.

I SAW her first kneeling in an alleyway, holding a hurt kitten in her arms. It was a disagreeably dirty kitten—the kind of kitten that lives furtively in city doorways, snatching its food from garbage cans, darting across the street when the traffic is at its worst, and enduring the cat-calls and cruelties of little children who have themselves never known kindness.

The kitten was dying. It had been struck in the head by a roughly thrown rock; and when its terrified eyes grew glassy she laid it down. A small Italian girl stood beside her and watched breathlessly.

"Jimmy done it," the small girl offered suddenly. "Oh-h, Jimmy!"

Jimmy, small also and dirty and unregenerate-looking, came slowly into the foreground. He faced her defiantly as she knelt beside the dead kitten.

"What 'che makin' so much fuss fer?" he questioned. "It's nothin' but a—cat!"

She looked up at him, her dark eyes glowing out from under a wreath of gray hair, with a great light—a mother-light. When she spoke she surprised us all—Jimmy, the small girl, and me.

"Dear," she said, "I don't think you quite understand. Come up to my house—I have cookies there—and I'll tell you why we should be kind to animals."

JIMMY went, lured by the promise of cookies. He stayed, interested in spite of himself in the stories she told him of birds, and beasts, and even fishes. He came again to her house, with a clean face and parted hair, and then going there got to be a habit. Jimmy later gave me his version of the case.

"She don' preach t' me," said Jimmy. "She's jus' nice an'—kind. She makes yer want ter be nice an' kind, too—t' folks an' kittens. Did yer know," he asked me, "that animals was like folks? That they could love yer, an' . . . ." he paused. "Up t' her house—"

"What," I questioned, "is her house like?"

"Oh," said Jimmy vaguely, "it ain't a house—really. But we calls it that. It's jus' a room in th' back, five flights up. But she's so . . ." Worriedly he sought for the right word. "Somehow yer don' notice her house," he finished.

I found out afterward that Jimmy was quite right. I met her, in quite the formal way, and went to call. It was indeed a poor little home, this room of hers, up five dark narrow flights of stairs, but it was a love-filled little home.

"Sometimes," she confessed to me laughingly, "I'm so hard up that I scarcely know where my next meal is coming from. But I always keep my jar of cookies for the children. Poor little tots! They've gotten to expect them."

"HOW did you ever happen to come here?" I asked.

"I came here to be an artist," she told me. "That was—long ago. But I found out that I wasn't needed—as an artist. And I didn't want to go back, a failure, to the little town I came from. So I took a small room and—well, began to look around. The kiddies in this neighborhood are a wild lot. I used to worry about them and wish that I might help them. 'If,' I used to say, 'I only had some money, I'd build a club room for them, and give them parties, and hire real teachers to make them love God, and nature, and little dumb creatures. If I had money I'd buy them ice cream, and take them to picture shows, and the circus,' I used to mourn.

"And then one day I was looking over an old school exercise-book and I saw the words, 'Kind hearts are more than coronets.' And I realized that perhaps if I just did my best with the children, I could help some, even if I didn't have any money. I had love to give instead.

"Jimmy isn't the only one. I have a Boys' Club, and a Little Girls' Sewing Circle, and a Friendship Association, and a Junior Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Society. It hasn't cost me a thing except a little kindness and simplicity and faith—and quite a bit of time.

SO she spoke. And as she told me of her creed of kindness I couldn't help thinking of another woman that I know, a woman who boasts of her blue-blooded ancestors, and has a coronet engraved on her stationery and emblazoned on the door of her motor car.

This other woman never comes down to the slums. "I hate dirt!" she says. She loves her expensive perfumed Pomeranian dog, but she wouldn't think of holding a dying kitten in her arms. She entertains expensively, royally, and her dinners are brilliant gatherings of ultra-brilliant people. But I have never seen a happy party gathered at her splendid carved mahogany table, and I have seen many happy parties grouped, chattering in three languages, about a certain cracked cookie-jar on a certain rickety little stand.

"Kind hearts are more than coronets, and simple faith than Norman blood."

It's true, more than true, friends of mine! All the family and riches and diamond crowns in the world won't make you worth while if the love of people has been left out of your heart. All the fine laces and velvets and satins can't make you beautiful—really beautiful—if your eyes are hard.

If life were a great copybook—and sometimes I can't help feeling that it is—and God were the great Teacher who told us what lines we should copy, I'm sure—oh, so sure!—that he would have us write the little verse about kind hearts on the whitest page of all.

Women Evangelists

IT is not only men who do the work of an evangelist. The peculiar talents of women are being utilized in bringing the message of salvation to those who have not heard, or who, having heard, have not heeded. Among the membership of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists are six women regularly employed in evangelistic work: Miss Victoria Booth-Clibborn, Rev. Mary N. Cox, Mrs. May L. Haight, Mrs. Bertha J. Harris, Rev. Eva Ludgate, Miss Sara C. Palmer. In addition to these there is in the party of Evangelist Sunday Mrs. William Asher, whose work with the young women is an important element in the success of the Sunday campaigns.

SIXES

For 200,000 Miles

John W. Bate, the builder of Mitchells, stands for lifetime cars. So we aim to have Mitchells give 200,000 mile service. Two Mitchells already have proved that they can do that.

To this end we have doubled our margins of safety in the past three years. Our standard now in every part is 100 per cent over-strength. Never before have cars built like Mitchells been built at Mitchell prices.

Let your Mitchell dealer show you what this means. Ask him for a list of great engineers who selected the Mitchell because of its endurance. You will certainly choose the car they chose, if you buy in the Mitchell class.

$4,000,000 in Extras

Mitchells have a wealth of features which other cars omit. On this year's output these extras cost us about $4,000,000.

There are 31 valuable features which most other cars omit. Things like a power tire pump, for instance.

There are cantilever springs which have never broken. There are oversize steering parts, built of Chrome-Vanadium. There is 24 per cent added luxury over our last year models.

All of these extras are paid for by savings, due to our wonderful factory efficiency. John W. Bate's methods, in the past few years, have cut our factory cost in two. The added luxury is paid for by savings made in our new body plant.

An Amazing $1150 Six

You will see this year a new Mitchell Six — Mitchell Junior. It has 40 horsepower and a 120-inch wheelbase. But it sells for $1150 at factory. No other car around that price comes anywhere near its value.

Yet the larger Mitchell is sold on the same basis. And it comes in all styles of bodies.

You will find no other car which gives you, in these ways, what you get in the Bate-built Mitchell.

The Importance of Self-Control

International Sunday School Lesson for May 20
Isa. 28:1-13

Temperance and National Destiny

By George D. Allison, Ph. D.

DRINK was already a national issue 2,642 years ago, according to Isaiah, in that a nation fell through its power insidiously to undermine the fabric of people and leaders! The "lost tribes" were lost through drink! With the menace of the mighty military power of Assyria hanging over them comes the prophet's appeal for sobriety and unity. This is certainly a lesson for America to-day.

In time of riot and trouble the wise mayor or sheriff gives as his first order "Close the saloons." Their output of strife and madness is endured in quieter days, but every one knows labor disturbances, political excitements and even revolutions owe much of their violence and bitterness to alcohol. Why was the great Russian upheaval accomplished almost without bloodshed? The world knows. No vodka! If the people had had access to their former favorite vice, the streets of Petrograd would have run with blood.

The nations are learning fast. Premier Lloyd George has said that drink is a more grevious danger to England than the enemy. France has prohibited the more fiery liquors. Russia surrendered millions of revenue and was more than repaid in manhood and self-control.

What will America do? A national amendment is before Congress. War makes its adoption a national duty.

Now is the time for every reader of the Christian Herald to push National Prohibition. Write to your representative in Congress.

Drink and Leadership

Isaiah brings his chief indictment against the leaders of Israel. The rulers and the priests were incompetent through their indulgence. It is true that conditions are better today, thank God! But even now we have our drinking senators and assemblymen.

But in another sense the charge is more sweepingly true. Because of this enemy within the gates of the nation—the liquor traffic—our leaders, like those of old, "err in vision, they stumble in judgment." They cater to the saloon vote; they are afraid to antagonize vicious interests; they hedge and quibble on measures that are the simplest justice to our democratic principles. In a number of states it is still impossible to get a majority of the legislators to grant towns the right to oust the vile dives that afflict the people.

Our judges still grant licenses in towns where they have never lived or visited, and gravely certify that these dramshops are "necessary and conducive to the public good!"

Conditions Worse To-day

In some respects we are worse off than in Isaiah's time. Never before in history were millions of dollars back of Alcoholism, and the best brains procurable devising ways and means to sell more every year. "We must advertise it down their throats," they declare. A flood of clever appeals has assailed us. "George Washington was a brewer," etc. Well, he was also a slaveholder; but neither is the reason why history remembers him.

Our country is still a partner in the booze business, which, it is safe to say, Israel was not. In England—worse yet—the traffic is a vested interest and cannot be suppressed without enormous payments in compensation. The premier can have their money and their sons, but he must not take away his countrymen's drinks. The Established Church did not respond to the suggestion of abstinence for the war with anything like enthusiasm. Why? There are bishops heavily interested in distillery stocks, and there are many among the clergy who will not forego their daily glass.

But now, at last, we have a clear-cut realization of the issue. Millions are organized to fight for temperance and national freedom. The American Church is awake. Prohibition is in politics. When a moral issue gets a hearing before a democracy, it is never settled till it is settled right. We saw that in slavery—a curse as old as drink, but now gone forever.

Isaiah a Pioneer Statesman

Get a new vision of this wonderful man of God. He was no idle dreamer, no vociferous fanatic. He was a cultured man of influence and insight. He was a statesman of fine ability. Two thousand six hundred years ago he pioneered for national righteousness.

Isaiah became a temperance reformer at a time when drunkenness was a part of the ritual of the pagan temples of religion. He foresaw the time when nation should not lift up sword against nation. He looked for a day when rulers should reign in righteousness and self-control. Let us share his indomitable hope of better things and, like him, work the harder when the times are evil.

How Slowly the World Learns

Verses 9 and 10 are the mockery of the public men at Isaiah's message. "Will he teach us? As though we were schoolboys! Do this and do that." It reminds us of the politician who was asked where he stood on prohibition and responded "This isn't a Sunday school class."

How slow men are to learn! Many cannot see anything in the whole temperance reform but a fanatical interference with their personal liberty, when it is really an attempt to lift the burden of centuries from the world. It takes wars and upheavals, strikes and riots, to get poor, common humanity either a free ballot, or a living wage, or a saloonless nation.

But they do learn. The politician now favors prohibition, at least when he runs for office!

The Importance of Self-Control

Though a national text is given, our lesson has its individual appeal as well. There are some who need the challenge to purify their bodies and minds from the poison of even a "moderate" indulgence in drink or drug. Many do not realize how far they are from being captains of their own souls.

We need a clarion call to a clean, well-poised, rigorous manhood and womanhood that will be prepared for war or peace, with all the issues of life calmly faced day by day. The whole Bible is one, with just this message. We are God's children, and kings and priests before him. "It is not for kings to drink wine, nor for princes to desire strong drink." In Leviticus 10:9 Aaron and his sons were enjoined to strict abstinence while on duty. Jesus said of his followers: "For their sakes I sanctify myself."

As intercessors for the weak and erring as watchmen on guard over the city, as representatives of a holy and wise God, Christians must be strict with themselves. Some, like St. Paul, have a hard fight for self-mastery. "I buffet my body and bring it into subjection."

God grant unto us the help of his Spirit that we may walk without fear, with controlled desires, and a calm serenity that shall impart strength and faith unto all whom we meet day by day.

The Young Men's Class

B. Self-Mastery a social responsibility.

The focus of political corruption. (c) Alcohol and a Prepared Manhood. Statistics of rejected recruits. Base hospital: "We spot the drinkers in no time."

C. Self-Mastery a Call of the Kingdom of Christ.

2. An elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession.

3. "He that overcometh"—the promises of Revelation 2 and 3. The Golden Text. "Every man that striveth in the games exerciseth self-control in all things." I Cor. 9 : 25.

Superintendent's Review

Paul was in training. To him life was no picnic or party. It was a serious thing, a hard battle, a Marathon race. He believed in preparedness: a heart prepared by God's grace, a willing spirit and also a self-controlled mind.

College boys gladly give up pie and cigarettes and late hours to win a baseball championship for Alma Mater. Soldiers endure hard fare, stony beds, a hail of fire and iron, for the sake of their country.

"Prison fare!" sneered a companion, when a young Christian chose water instead of wine. "No," the other responded, "garrison fare. I am never off my guard." The fellow who never drinks makes the safest sentry, the surest shot, and the steadiest marcher.

If you have a serious task, you instinctively tighten up on yourself. Kings and generals have taken the pledge for the war. We Christians are on the job for the betterment of the whole world. We have disadvantages enough. Never add the handicap of drink or drug.

Heads up! Eyes right! Be prepared to "fight the good fight of faith." Self-control in all things!

Suddenly the federal trenches lit up with scores of flashes like lightning. For a few minutes that hill-top resembled a volcano, belching fire and roaring with a tattoo of explosions. The nails and slugs of the grenades screamed through the air with unearthly pandemonium. Then came silence, punctuated only by a few pistol shots that showed the hill was captured. The next day Villa entered Torreon.

At this period I was almost constantly with him as a newspaper correspondent, journeyed on his private train and accompanied him in the field. One picture of his army will always stick in my mind. Villa was standing by his campfire, talking to his officers. It was the night before the battle of Zacatecas. Down the road which ran near by poured a seemingly endless procession of horsemen. Company after company of the big-hatted soldiers rode out of the night, passed as if in review before the fire and disappeared. As they rode they sang in the barbaric falsetto of the Northern Indian:

"La Cucaracha, la Cucaracha
Ya no puede caminar,
Porque no puede, porque no tiene
Marihuana que fumar,"

the marching song of the Villa army.

Walking back from the road about a hundred yards, I sat down on a little hill and watched the passing legions. For miles down the road I could see a winding procession of tiny fireflies glowing and wavering in the dark. These were the lighted cigarettes of the troopers. Hour after hour they passed, chanting in falsetto refrain the inspiring "Song of the Cockroach," with its thousand verses. The next day several thousand of these men died.

Since my return to the United States, there are three questions I am always being asked. They have come with such unfailing regularity I will attempt to answer them here.

First: How many wives has Villa?

Second: Where did he get the money to carry on his campaigns? Were Americans backing him?

Third: Why don't somebody kill him in retaliation for his many executions and cruelties?

It is true that Villa has three wives. The first two he married in Chihuahua and the third in Torreon; but it was his first wife, Luz, who was his companion in most of his campaigns. He was in Mexico City when he received the announcement of the birth of his only son. His Torreon wife was the mother. Villa announced the event with great glee to his staff.

"Now I will never get married again," he exclaimed with pride. "I have a son."

The boy is now living with his mother at San Antonio, Texas.

The source of Villa's financial backing requires some explanation. It must be remembered that Mexico was a country of great natural wealth, concentrated in the hands of a few wealthy men. Most of these men fled from the country, but the immense properties remained in Villa's hands, and he took every dollar the "Cientificos" could be forced to pay.

The case of Luis Terrazas, Jr., son of the former governor, is a good example. Luis "Chico" was captured by Villa and incarcerated in the Chihuahua penitentiary. For nearly a year the younger Terrazas was kept in prison and forced to pay over $500,000 gold to save his life. Time and again he was stood up before a firing squad and compelled to buy temporary immunity.

Another great source of wealth was the immense herds of cattle which ranged the haciendas of northern Mexico. Villa would confiscate thousands of these cattle, ship them to Texas and sell them for gold. When this was, in a measure, stopped by the cattlemen's associations, Villa built a slaughter-house in Juarez, shipped the packed meat and sold the hides. Only one company was permitted to deal in hides, and that was an American concern.

Probably the greatest income came from the "bilimbiques," a fiat currency issued by the revolutionary government. This was simply a printed promise to pay when the revolution was successful. Merchants were forced to accept this money in Mexico at the rifle. Its current value, however, was a fictitious gambling value, due to the operations of the money brokers on the border. When Villa was winning victories, the rate of exchange went up; when he suffered reverses, the price went down. In time the country was flooded by this fiat money. Printing presses were kept busy night and day turning it out. Many millions of dollars were issued, until finally its value was less than the cost of printing.

Although Villa sucked in money from a thousand sources, he was compelled to pay it out almost as fast as it came in. His army was better armed and clothed than any insurrecto faction in the field. He was robbed right and left by a swarm of gun-runners, speculators and concession-seekers who followed his trail. There are many men on the border today who made fortunes through their dealings with Villa. You may have read how an Italian gave Villa $500 to start the expedition against Huerta. This man was rewarded by a present of one of the gambling privileges in Juarez. He made a fortune from his operations. Later, when Villa was in need, he called on this Italian for a small percentage of his winnings. The Italian packed his money and silently flitted to the American bank of the Rio Grande. Villa flew into one of his blind rages.

"I cannot understand these foreigners!" he declared. "This man gave me his last dollar when I was in need. Then I present him with a fortune. When I ask him for a small part, he runs away."

The stories of great hordes of money concealed by Villa are pure fiction. Although he handled millions, his government always led a hand-to-mouth

ELEANOR H. PORTER, the author of "Just David" and "Pollyanna," has created two of the most famous child characters in fiction.

In her new book, "The Road to Understanding," she shows equal insight into the hearts of children of a larger growth. The theme of the story is as old as love—the marriage of a poor girl to a rich man. Every novel-reader—every one who has ever known of a similar situation—knows there followed misunderstandings and estrangement. In spite of the fine courage with which they began their life together, Burke and Helen Denby found in their own characters insidious, unlooked-for traits which threatened to destroy their happiness. With intense interest the reader follows the development of their characters, as under the discipline of life the pleasure-loving girl becomes a noble and charming woman, and the hero ripens to responsible and sympathetic manhood. The happy ending holds surprise as well as pleasure.

In illustrating the story Mrs. Blumenschein has caught the spirit of Mrs. Porter's theme and the personality of her characters, so that the story is one of those rare ones in which story and pictures are in gratifying harmony.

"The Road to Understanding" began in the April 4th issue of the Christian Herald, and will continue in every issue for several months. It is also published in book form at $1.40.

We will begin your subscription with the April 4th issue of the Christian Herald, containing the first instalment of this story.

BILLY SUNDAY'S NEW YORK REVIVAL TO BE THE GREATEST IN HISTORY

BILLY SUNDAY'S revival meetings, which began in New York on April 8th, and will continue for three months. will be the biggest ever held. The Tabernacle covers a whole city block, with seats for 20,000 persons, who will listen twice a day to the evangelist.

Forty thousand persons a day! Think of it! Enough to populate a goodsized town. In all, far more than 3,000,000 people will hear him speak.

More than 300 churches are actively interested in the movement. A special effort is being made to enroll 50,000 men in the Bible classes. Among the most picturesque features are the trained choruses of 2,000 voices each, arranged in three distinct choirs—that is to say 6,000 voices.

The Christian Herald is publishing a weekly sermon by Billy Sunday, selected by himself, during his campaign in New York, and, being on the spot and in touch with the great evangelist, we believe our descriptions of the outstanding incidents of the momentous campaign will give an intimate insight into this the greatest of all revivals.

THE GREATER UNITED STATES, or, OUR NEW INDUSTRIAL EMPIRE

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

IN this issue of the Christian Herald appears the first of a series of travel articles by Mr. Carpenter. He will make studies of our farms, factories, and mines from the standpoint of efficiency and industrial preparedness and will make careful investigations of the wealth and resources of the United States, telling how they may be mobilized in times of need.

The United States is the richest country of the world. Its wealth is 220 thousand millions of dollars, and the gold of other nations is rolling in as never before.

Mr. Carpenter will make extensive travels throughout the United States covering the great agricultural and industrial centers. He will take up the great industries and show the new things that are taking place in them, especially drugs, dyes, etc. These articles will deal with New England, with the Newest South, with its iron and sulphur, cotton and chemicals and after that with the bread and meat lands of the Mississippi Valley. He will show what is going on in and about the Great Lakes from Buffalo to Duluth, including the vast iron mines on which our manufacturing industry is founded.

Mr. Carpenter will visit and tell about the fast-growing Southwest, including the oil and gasoline centers of Texas and Oklahoma, the new States of Arizona and New Mexico, and also the Northwest and the Pacific Slope.

The Rockies, with their gold and silver, and the mountains of copper now being mined with steam shovels, will give interesting stories, as will also Uncle Sam's work in Exploiting our National Parks, and in Reclaiming the Desert and in Draining the Swamps.

existence. It is true, however, that some of his former confederates escaped to the United States with large sums.

Villa's apparent immunity from assassination is easily told. He has seemed to lead a charmed life, and he has the cunning of a wolf of his own desert. He once told me that he had been wounded eleven times. He has the instinctive caution of a fox. At night, when not sleeping on his guarded train, he would throw a blanket over his shoulders and disappear in the darkness, to sleep in some arroyo, concealed from his own soldiers.

His main protection was the famous Escolta Eldorado, or Guard of Gold. This was a picked company, which was the choicest collection of gunmen and killers ever gathered together. It was headed by the notorious Colonel Fierro, the "Butcher." This Fierro was the official lord high executioner of Villa's army, and has literally killed hundreds of men with his own hand. After the battle of Paredon, forty-four officers were captured. Following the custom of both armies, these federal officers were sentenced to death. They were stood up in a line on the battlefield, their hands tied behind them. Fierro walked down the line and killed every man with his pistol; shooting six times and standing and reloading.

When we entered the city of Guadalajara, Fierro discovered an old enemy living in the city. This man had quit the insurrection and was working as a carpenter. In an accident his leg had been broken, and when discovered by Fierro, he was lying helpless in bed. The "Butcher" had the injured man brought to the depot and placed on his private car. Next day I chanced to be on Fierro's car when we left the city. The "Butcher" was playing cards with a group of Villa officers as the train started its journey. About nine miles from the city he told the conductor to stop the train. Grasping the injured man by the collar he dragged him down the car steps, feebly moaning from the agony of pain. Dropping him like a sack of meal by the side of the track, Fierro shot him through the head, signaled the train, and then, stepping aboard, picked up his cards and resumed the game. It was the most cold-blooded, dastardly act I have ever seen.

These men of the Guard of Gold guarded Villa day and night. No suspicious-appearing person was permitted to come near their general without being disarmed. Colonel Pani, of the Carrancista faction, had been an outspoken enemy of Villa's during the Aguascalientes convention. He was an enormous man, with deep, rumbling voice, and had won wide reputation as a brave fighter. When Villa occupied Mexico City, Colonel Pani refused to flee, and remained at the house of a friend. Villa learned of his presence and had him arrested and brought before him. The giant Pani was brought before Villa, surrounded by a guard. The grim-faced Fierro, the "Butcher," stood beside him.

"Pani," Villa began, "you have denounced me and called me a bandit. Is there any reason why you should not die?"

"You are a bandit. You can kill me if you want to. Killing men who have fought for Mexico is your trade.'

Villa poured out a volley of profanity at the tall prisoner, striding back and forth across the room. His eyes protruded and seemed to revolve like those of a madman. Then, his expression changing, he turned and said:

"Pani, you are the first man who ever looked in my eyes and defied me. You have been a brave man. Join my army and I will give you five hundred men to command. Your right place is in the army of Pancho Villa."

"I do not fight with bandits and robbers," rumbled the giant, staring unafraid at the Terror of the North.

"Fierro, take him out and shoot him!" screamed Villa in a blaze of passion.

The "Butcher" escorted the great Pani out of the house. After pacing excitedly about the room for a moment, Villa called one of his secretaries. In a few minutes Fierro stalked back in the room. Pulling his pistol from its holster he flipped an empty cartridge out.

"Mi general, one shot killed him," he calmly remarked.

"Está bueno," replied Villa, and returned to his conversation.

On one occasion, after the battle of Zacatecas, thirty-one officers were condemned to death. A firing squad of Yaqui Indians were doing the shooting and the prisoners were being placed against the wall, two or three at a time. Several bottles of cognac were brought out by the executioners and drinks were passed to the men about to die. One young officer, a boy of twenty, was busily engaged in writing in a notebook. When the time came for him to die, the Indian sergeant gruffly ordered him to step into place. Turning to the higher officers, he said:

"I was just writing a letter to my brother. Will you let me finish it before the fusilada?"

Sternly the sergeant shook his head and motioned him to take his place against the wall.

"Three thousand pardons, señores," exclaimed a dapper little major. "May I take his place?"

The sergeant nodded; the little major jauntily stepped before the firing squad, and smilingly met his death. The young lieutenant finished his letter before he, too, was killed.

These executions were the horrible feature of the Mexican war. It is my belief that more men have been executed by the firing squad in Mexico, the last six years, than have died in battle. All factions were equally guilty.

After his spectacular victory at Torreon, Villa found himself hailed as the conqueror of north Mexico. His military exploits far excelled those of any other revolutionary general, and in his usual fashion he proved headstrong and hard to control. General Carranza, who had been accepted by all factions as the "First Chief in charge of executive power," grew fearful of Villa's growing strength and appointed General Panfilo Natera to command the expedition against Zacatecas, where Huerta's forces were preparing to make their last stand. Natera was defeated, and Villa rushed his forces to the front, contrary to orders. After a two days' desperate battle, in which several thousand men were killed, he captured the city, and drove the federals in disorder back toward Mexico City. General Obregon, who had carried on a successful campaign down the west coast of Mexico, shortly afterward captured Guadalajara, the second city in Mexico, and marched on the capital. General Zapata with his southern Indian forces had captured several of the suburbs to Mexico City. Huerta, realizing that his cause was lost, fled from Mexico to Havana, Cuba, and Obregon took possession of the national capital.

The revolution had accomplished its purpose. Madero had been avenged and Huerta the dictator driven into exile. Yet the war had only started.

General Villa felt that he had been ignored and insulted by Carranza, and he sulkily withdrew to Chihuahua, refusing to obey the orders of the First Chief.

General Obregon made a trip to Chihuahua in an effort to placate Villa, and narrowly escaped execution. A national convention of all insurgent leaders had been called in Mexico City to draft a constitution and form a provisional government. Villa refused to participate in this conference unless it was held on neutral ground, and Aguascalientes was selected as the place of meeting. After a farcical session, lasting two months, the convention elected Eulalio Gutierrez, a middle-of-the-road candidate, as provisional president of Mexico. Carranza refused to ratify the choice, and Villa dropped all pretense and declared war on the faction headed by the First Chief.

His army was moved southward in forty-five troop trains, with cavalry as advance guard and flankers. Carranza's troops withdrew before the advancing division of the north, and in November, 1914, Villa and Zapata were in joint control of Mexico City. It was at this time the United States withdrew its soldiers from Vera Cruz after occupying that seaport for seven months. Carranza moved into that city in the wake of the returing Americans, and established his headquarters there.

Villa was not at the apex of his career. He made a grand entry into the capital, with Zapata riding by his side. In the line of march were forty-five thousand soldiers and eighty-one modern cannon, captured from the federals.

Villa and Zapata entered the national palace and posed for their photographs, sitting in the gilded reception room where President Porfirio Diaz formerly held his receptions. After the photograph was taken a bystander called Villa's attention to the fact that he was sitting in the chair of Benito Juarez, the Liberator of Mexico. Jumping to his feet he exclaimed:

"Who am I that I should sit in the seat of the great Juarez? I will never be President of Mexico."

About this time I severed my connection with the Associated Press and prepared to return to the United States. I was disgusted. Twice had the revolution been won; still there was no end of the fighting in sight.

The day before I expected to leave I called on Villa to say good-by.

"No, no, Tejano," he said. "You must not leave us now. I will make you a major on my estado mayor."

Calling one of his secretaries he ordered the commission made out. I still keep it as a memento of the Mexican revolution.

Villa's high-handed methods soon began to weaken his power. Provisional President Gutierrez was practically his prisoner, and on one occasion Villa slapped the president's face. He was proving that, although he could conquer, he could not rule. Many of his generals felt that they were entitled to a share of the credit for his campaigns, and he treated them as if they were unruly schoolboys.

Finally he left Mexico City for a tour of the northern districts controlled by his troops. Hardly had he left the capital when a number of his followers revolted. President Gutierrez, urged by this faction, fled to Toluca; and Villa thus had his president stolen over night.

Then followed the campaign of the Carrancistas, led by General Obregon, which is recent history. Deserted by many of his best leaders, he came storming down from the north to meet this new coalition. At the battles of Silao and Celaya he first knew the bitterness of defeat. His star was waning and day after day came reports of new desertions.

Then came the hardest blow of all, which turned him against the United States. Up until this time he had apparently been a favorite of the American government. A special agent of the State Department accompanied him on all his journeys. His principal port of entry at Juarez had been kept open for the importation of munitions of war.

Suddenly the policy at Washington was changed. A strict embargo was enforced on the border, and his supply of ammunition was cut off. Then came the announcement from Washington that Carranza had been recognized as the head of the de facto government.

Of Villa's movements since that time I know only what friends from Mexico have told me. He felt that the Americans had turned against him in his hour of greatest need, and in his usual fashion he retaliated by attacking the Americans.

Of the raid into American territory at Columbus, New Mexico, I know nothing. He may or may not have been present in person. It is characteristic of what he might be expected to do when in one of his blind unreasoning rages.

Villa is still in the saddle.

As long as he rides the desert llanos, with his "Guard of Gold" at his back, he looms as a storm-cloud on the border, threatening the peace of our country. There is only one way he will ever quit the fight: that is when death comes to him. He is the Mexican problem.

And Four Years to Go

THE Baptist Five Year Program has passed its first milestone. The aims of the movement were expressed in five goals; a million additions to churches by baptism; a missionary force of 5,000; two millions of endowment for the pension fund; six millions for educational endowment and equipment; an annual income of six millions for missions and benevolence.

During the first year the proportionate one-fifth of the goals was not all reached. Baptisms for the year totaled 106,791, an increase of 21,763 over the year before, but 93,000 short of 200,000. The increase in the mission force must of necessity come slowly, for young people ready now to dedicate their lives to Christian work must be trained before they can be sent out. Goal number three was more than one-third reached in March, 1916, the endowment then having reached $779,455.45, an increase of half a million in a year. Goal four was to be attained in part by encouraging Baptist young people to seek higher education. In the year the number of student pastors increased from eleven to eighteen, and the attendance at Baptist colleges and universities, including the University of Chicago, whose students represent all creeds, increased from 16,209 to 16,898, the number of students registering as Baptists increasing in the same time from 2,304 to 3,081. The campaign for endowment and equipment realized nearly half the five-year goal, $2,722,022, of which $1,116,147 went to Chicago University and $304,800 to mission schools. Goal six, an annual income for missions of $6,000,000, was nearly half reached, the income leaping from $3,369,406 in 1915 to $4,757,556 in 1916. There are nearly four years yet to come of this Five Year Program, and the church is just gathering momentum. Somebody will need to set those goals higher or they will prove but to have been the foundations of the final structure of achievement.

Prohibition As a War Measure

By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART

THE United States government is being urged to immediately prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, as a necessary preparation for the war. It must this year have the equivalent of the 618,000,000 bushels of grain that last year was made into intoxicants, to grind into flour for the army and navy and the people at home. To help carry out its national program, it needs this year the $2,000,000,000 cash that were wasted last year on liquor.

The experiences of the nations of Europe on this subject leave only one side to the question. There was grain enough for bread or vodka in Russia, but not enough for both; and the Czar and the Duma took the grain for bread and cut out the vodka. France followed with restriction of the traffic almost as severe as that of Russia. Germany, Austria, Italy and other nations greatly curtailed the manufacture and sale of liquor. England trifled with the question and suffered most bitterly, as its official Blue Book admits. It has just taken the deadly clutch of the brewers from the throat of the government.

The United States Brewers' Association, at a meeting of its directors in New York City recently, passed the following resolutions: "At this critical juncture the Association places itself unreservedly at the service of the President of the United States and pledges him its unqualified support in any measure he may take in behalf of our beloved country. We further pledge ourselves individually and collectively to any service that may be deemed necessary, in order that the honor of our flag, the integrity of our nation, and the spirit of our institutions may be preserved." While we do not impugn the patriotism or loyalty of individual brewers, we count the offer of service by such an Association as sublime sarcasm, as colossal effrontery. Do these gentlemen not know that their business, counted by all nations as a danger in time of peace, is considered a handicap, a positive curse, in time of war? Did not they hear Lloyd George himself say that England had cause to fear drink more than all the submarines of the enemy? Are they blind to the fact that more than one-half of Europe, as a war measure, has outlawed drink as a destroyer of mental and physical efficiency? We suggest that the brewers make good their offer of service to the country by closing their breweries at once, and putting out the fires of their furnaces, or turn them into mills where the grain may be ground into food instead of being rotted into poison.

The brewers and distillers, in the critical time of the Civil War, made the same patriotic offer, which was accepted with the understanding that at the close of the war the heavy liquor tax should be lifted. It never was lifted. Then and there the brewers and distillers began one of the most cruel and diabolical despotisms over our government that any land ever endured; which despotism has continued for over fifty years, until now the people are freeing themselves from that tyranny. We beg the authorities to make no new unholy alliance with a business which is the nation's greatest enemy.

By an order issued by Lord Devonport, the British Food Controller, the annual output of beer in the United Kingdom is now limited to 10,000,000 barrels, as compared with 26,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1916, and the supply of wines and spirits that may be taken out of bond is reduced by 50 per cent. of the amount taken out in 1916. British orators point out that the drink trade had been using shipping equal to a fleet of sixty ships of 5,000 tons, working all the time; that the drink traffic has consumed more food than the whole British army, and that the weight of food and other stuffs carried about for it in ships and trains has been equal to the totals of the solid material carried by the admiralty to all the fighting fronts.

As the brewers can hardly be expected to make good their proffer of service to the government in the present crisis by closing their establishments or changing them into mills for flour, we suggest to Congress the propriety of performing that patriotic service for them. First of all, Congress should forbid the sale of liquor to any soldier or sailor of the Republic, or its sale or use in a zone about military camps, recruiting stations, or mobilization grounds. There are several ways in which Congress can legally stop the liquor traffic in the nation as a war measure. It can put an excessive tax on it that will kill it. It can invoke the Interstate Commerce Law and forbid the transportation of any liquor for beverage purposes, or the shipment of grain to be distilled or fermented into drink; or it may claim its right, under the "Common Defense and General Welfare" clause, to prohibit grain and food material from being used to make liquor during the war, in order to conserve the fighting power of the nation. Bills covering these phases of the subject have been introduced into Congress, and others will be presented. The right ones should be adopted; for this nation, with a majority of the states and population dry in times of peace, is in no mood to trifle with the relation of the liquor problem to the greater issues that now confront it.

Meanwhile, the National Constitutional Prohibition Resolution has been introduced into the Senate by Senators Sheppard and Gallinger, and in the House by Representatives Smith of Idaho and Webb of North Carolina. The bills are identical and are introduced in each body by a Democrat and a Republican respectively. The text is short, but it is immensely important. This is the bill:

"Section 1. The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes, are hereby prohibited.

"Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation; and nothing in this article shall deprive the several states of their power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

This, it will be seen, is a bone-dry bill. There are strong hopes that the resolution will be passed in the near future by the necessary two-thirds majority and ratified by three-fourths of the State Legislatures.

In five short months six states have gone dry and 10,000,000 people, an average of 2,000,000 a month, have passed under prohibition. Of the 2,543 counties in the United States, 2,243 are dry, leaving barely 300 wet counties in the entire nation. Let prohibition as a war measure be adopted without delay. And, freed by the decision of the Supreme Court and the votes of a free people, the Stars and Stripes would then fly, a stainless flag over a saloonless nation.

AMERICAN FLAG
For All Occasions

HAVE you a good United States Flag for use on holidays—in fact on any day during these strenuous times? If not, here is an opportunity to get one - a well made flag, 4 x 6 feet.

Some time ago we decided to make a special flag offer to our readers. Thousands of these flags were placed in Christian Herald homes throughout the country. Perhaps we ordered too many, or perhaps the particular occasion for which flags were wanted had gone by. At any rate, we were left with a few fine flags on hand, but now is the time when every good American should be able to display "Old Glory."

The illustration is an exact photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. It is made by the Dunkards of Pennsylvania. To insure durability, the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent, bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. The pole is NOT included.

SPECIAL OFFER
We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal), all for $3.00.

SPECIAL OFFER
We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, to any present subscriber who will send us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Is It Easier to Be Good When Poor?

Epworth League Topic. James 2 : 5; Matt. 13 : 22; 19 : 16–22; I Tim. 6 : 9, 10, 17–19

IT is not often that one man is given all the good things of this world. James suggests that he who is poor in this world's goods may be rich in faith; and Paul tells Timothy that they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and declares that the love of money is the root of all evil.

There are few men of meager incomes who have not dreamed time and again of all the good they would do if they only had as much money as somebody of whom they have heard. Sometimes such an one gains riches and really sets out to build in fact the structure of his dreams; but many another attaining riches forgets the dreams of his poorer days in the cares of wealth and the desire to add to it which always accompanies money. There seems to be no point at which humanity can be satisfied with the things which it possesses. The greater the struggle to secure riches, the more certain is it that the soul of the struggler will be to a greater or less degree torn from its anchorage of faith. Money easily becomes a god, and after that a tyrant. There is no doubt that it is easier to be good when poor, for riches untouched by grace bring temptations. There is also no doubt that it is easy, if we will, to do good with this world's goods. It is not necessary, possessing some wealth, to yield to the ever-present temptation to add to it by unworthy means. It is only necessary to keep the wealth in its proper place as a possession and not permit it to possess us. The trouble with the young man who went away sorrowful was that his "much goods" owned him rather than he them.

Although it is easier to do good when wealthy, it is also possible for the man of little means to make himself a mighty factor in the Kingdom through the merchandise of righteousness which is among the fruits of the Spirit. He may not be able to found an orphanage or endow a hospital; but he can bring the message of salvation to a hungry heart; he can bring comfort to the sorrowing, solace to the dying, and comradeship to the lonely. Money will buy none of these things.

Growing as Christ Grew

(Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Luke 2 : 41–52 (Union Meeting of Juniors and Intermediates)

THE last phrase of the reference is the key to the topic. "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man." Divine though he was, the boy Jesus grew physically and mentally according to the same natural laws as any child or man. He grew in wisdom by listening carefully and observing closely. Without doubt he grew in favor with God and men in the same way that any one today can win such favor; by showing himself ready at all times to do his part, by being willing to be instructed and able to give a good account of himself as occasion required. It is impossible to think of the child Jesus as wilful or opinionated or "smart" or sulky. Any of these qualities prevents growth in wisdom and excludes from the favor of men, at least.

The Senior organization owes to the Juniors and Intermediates a good example of the growth in grace so completely manifested in the life of the child Jesus. If the Seniors set an example of willingness to learn, willingness to serve; if, like the child Christ, they are earnestly about the Father's business, the young folks approaching Senior age will covet membership in the Senior society and will enter it gladly and add to its power the force of their enthusiasm.

Not much can be gained by telling the Junior societies how a thing should be done, but there is much profit in giving them a good example.

Relief Work Goes On

IN these days when wars increase and desolations multiply, mercy alone of all the Christian graces finds all doors open and a free course everywhere for her feet. And mercy is proving anew to the world the validity of Christian professions. The members of the Christian Herald Family have made a notable record for continuous and sustained giving, the contributions to the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, on April 25, having reached a total of $281,855.36. Five thousand dollars was sent on March 28 to Pastor Chas. Wagner in France for the ministry to souls and bodies, which is under his direction. The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, on April 21, announced that its fund had passed the $3,000,000 mark. Although hampered in its work by war conditions and disappointed at its inability to deliver at Beirut the cargoes of the Des Moines and the Caesar, which at last reports were still anchored at Alexandria, this committee has nevertheless found it possible to do much effective work in the territory under the control of the Turkish empire through funds cabled to the missionaries in these fields who are remaining at their posts in spite of the breaking of Turkish-American relations. It is still possible to transfer money by cable for the relief of suffering to a number of other fields from which American diplomatic representatives have withdrawn.

Even should this last avenue of relief be closed, there would still be crying need among the refugees under Russian, British and French protection, for every dollar that can be raised in the United States or among her allies. Hundreds of thousands of Armenians crossed into the Russian Caucasus before Russian troops emancipated their native land from Turkish rule. Other hundreds of thousands of Poles and Galicians are encamped behind the Russian lines, and there are Belgian refugee camps in Holland and England and France. Widows and orphans multiply in every land.

In America, just now facing the ordeal of fire, we may well open our hearts even wider for that relief of world-wide suffering which is still within our power.

Please address your gifts to the Christian Herald, Room 93, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State any preference you may have as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

A varnish cannot be all things to all surfaces

The Sherwin-Williams Company makes a special varnish for floors because floors get a kind of wear that no other surface gets. And the same is true of furniture and woodwork and out-of-doors surfaces.

MAR-NOT FOR FLOORS

Floors are walked on, danced on, and furniture is dragged over them. They are scrubbed and swept and rubbed. Mar-Not meets these conditions, holds its looks and gives you long service.

SCAR-NOT FOR INTERIOR WORK

The steam from a radiator, the heat of a dish or the splash of boiling water, has no effect on Scar-Not. It takes a rich, high polish; extensively used by furniture manufacturers.

REXPAR
FOR OUTSIDE USE

Weather is relentless in its attacks on varnish. Rexpar can be exposed to heat, cold, rain or snow; or even submerged under water, and still retain its lustre and never turn white.

In Mar-Not, Scar-Not and Rexpar the Sherwin-Williams Company has solved the varnishing problem of these surfaces just as it has solved the finishing problems of all home surfaces.

Tell the Sherwin-Williams dealer in your town what surface you want to varnish and he will give you the right kind for your purpose.

Send for Booklet
"The A B C of Home Painting"

It tells how to paint, varnish, stain or enamel every surface in and around your home.

Questions and Answers

F. G. T., Etna, Me. 1. The prophecy recorded in Mal. 4 : 1, 3 refers primarily to the judgment coming on Jerusalem, and in further perspective it has reference to the day of general judgment. In Matt. 6 : 30 the oven is referred to as burning the grass of the field; even as here the wicked are referred to as stubble that shall be burnt. 2. The terms "soul" and "spirit" are used interchangeably. Roundly defined, the soul usually stands for the life, the affections, the will, the consciousness; while the spirit stands for the higher element by which we apprehend spiritual truths. (See I Thess. 5 : 23.) 3. The correct exposition of Rom. 11 : 26 is held to be that Paul did not mean that every Jew shall be saved, but rather that the ancient people of God shall be restored as a nation to God's favor. 4. Following the example of Jesus in Matt. 26 : 42, and remembering that God's omniscience and love know better than we do what is best for us, it is not only proper but indispensable that in all our prayers we should bow to the will of God, and let it prevail over our own desires and our own will.

Anxious Arnold, Iowa. The story of Ben Hur is fiction. Novelists draw on their imagination for incidents which they consider in keeping with the characters depicted in their stories; they also use all available information to make their allusions to the customs and conditions of the places and times of their stories correct. In the case of Ben Hur, the New Testament narration furnished much information; but the secular history of the time of Christ, and the studies of archeologists and Biblical scholars, must have been freely used.

W. B., Metcalfe, Miss. We read in Matt. 8: 5–7, "There came unto him a centurion, beseeching him, and saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. And Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him." Did Jesus go to the centurion's home?

In Luke 7 : 6, in what seems to be another account of the same incident, we read, "And Jesus went with them," but it seems that he did not reach the house, for we read, verse 10, "And they that were sent [to dissuade Jesus from going], returning to the house, found the servant whole."

J. R., Dayton, Ohio. The annual metal output of the United States varies. Last year, according to the Nation's Business, this country produced 42,000,000 tons of steel, or more than half the world's total production. We produced also, the same year, 2,300,000,000 pounds of copper, and this year will do one-third better. Our zinc production was 658,000 tons, and although most of our tin ore comes from abroad, we shall have a domestic output of 18,000 tons for 1917.

C. F. W. M., East Rutherford, N. J., writes: "Quoting St. Paul, you said that he was not afraid to preach the whole 'Gospel.' What was meant, I take it, was 'the whole counsel of God' (Acts 20 : 27). The apostle had preached unto the Corinthians the 'Law' plainly and sharply, and it had done its work; it brought them to repentance. The 'Gospel' is not used thus, but follows the law to bind the broken-hearted and soothe the wounded, awakened conscience. The Law is the holy will of God with all his demands, and the Gospel is the good news of God's gracious will and purpose, telling what he has done, still does and will do to save us. Fearlessness and boldness are needed to preach the Law, for it 'worketh wrath'; it required fearlessness to rebuke sin and the appearance of evil. To preach the Gospel no courage of that kind is needed, but that which St. Paul boasts of: 'I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ.' It is the writer's opinion, after twenty-five years of preaching in churches both East and West, that the young preacher generally is unafraid, possibly often rushing where angels fear to tread! In the first flush of zealous, strong, young manhood, he preaches 'straight.' But after a few years the young man finds that is not wanted; and he must pay for his inexperience. Now, having used part of his strength and lost some of his courage, he begins to trim sail, and because of those dependent upon him he tempers his message to suit his hearers, for if he does not, his is a short stay, and he is driven from place to place. He begins to tread softly. Then he heeds the advice of some experienced older brother, 'to preach the Law in an evangelical spirit.' Hence there is a lack of 'boldness and fearlessness' in preachers, especially at the age of forty-five to fifty and thereabouts, more than in those of twenty-five years. Experience of over twenty-five years has proven it to the writer, and many brethren in office have admitted it to me in their most private confessions and confidences."

Mrs. J. P. B., Chester, S. C. There is nothing wrong or un-Biblical in believing that your departed daughter can be with you in spirit. In Heb. 12 : 1, we are told that witnesses surround believers and observe our trials and victories.

G. H. A., Masonville, Colo. The words translated "brass" in the Old Testament are defined in Young's Analytical Concordance as "brass, copper." It is obvious that in Deut. 8 : 9 word "brass" is a mistranslation, if looked at from the modern meaning of the word. It is evident that the translators were not thinking of the compound of copper and zinc now known as brass. In most passages of the Old Testament, the correct translation would be "copper," though it may sometimes mean "bronze," an alloy of copper and tin.

J. B. N., Atlantic, Iowa, and Old-Fashioned Reader. In raising money for the Lord's work, the simple method of free-will offerings alone is indicated in Scripture (see Ex. 35 : 21–29; II Cor., chapters 8 and 9; Matt. 10 . 8). This does not mean, however, that a church may not rightfully employ other means for raising necessary funds, and if it uses its basement for sociables, bazaars, suppers, etc., who can say it is doing wrong? Study carefully Paul's words about judging and about liberty (Rom. 14; I Cor. 8; I Cor. 10 : 19–33), and you will readily see that the very heart of the Christian system and the new dispensation is that people, after having love for God and love for their neighbor implanted in their souls, are free to use their sanctified judgment in matters of conduct not definitely prescribed by the moral law.

Mrs. W. W., North Clarendon, Vt. The Gospel has not yet been preached to all nations. There are certain parts of interior Africa, also Tibet in Asia, and remote sections of interior China, Turkestan and Kurdistan, as well as parts of Arabia and the interior of South America, which are yet unevangelized.

A. B. W., Jackson, Mich. The "seven sayings" of Jesus at the crucifixion are as follows: 1. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." 2. "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise." 3. "Woman, behold thy son!" 4. "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" 5. "I thirst." 6. "It is finished." 7. "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

STEEL

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THEY think that we're just animals, almost,
We men who work with steel.
A lady visitor was here the other day;
She looked at me, an' I could hear her say,
"My, what a life! I s'pose his only boast
Is muscles!"
She didn't understand,
She couldn't know that we have dreams as grand
As any she could have. We wonder where
The rivets that we make are goin' to,
An' if the engine wheels we turn will go
Through tropic heat, or if they'll plow through snow;
An' as we watch, we sorter grow to care
About the steel. Why, it's as shiny blue
As jew'ls! An' every bit is, well, a part
Of life to us. Sometimes my very heart
Thanks God that I've a man-sized job to do!

V. B., Lumberton, N. C. Conscience has been defined as the faculty in man which enables him to form moral judgments. While all possess it, its value and efficiency must depend upon training. Thus, the educated conscience may be described as more keenly sensitive in its powers of discrimination than the uneducated one. Again, by the awakened conscience man is led to see his own wickedness and need of cleansing and forgiveness; whereas the seared or dulled conscience of the hardened and persistent moral offender, never having been awakened, may come perilously near to being indifferent to all moral restrictions. We may here repeat what we have already said on a previous occasion: that it is the experience of those who are living close to God that the conscience is quickened and the choice of the good instead of the evil is made unhesitatingly. The unawakened conscience will not always warn us, although it may upbraid us afterward; but in the case of one who waits on God, and who asks him for guidance and direction in all the affairs of life—and especially for divine strength to discern and resist temptation—in such a case, conscience is a faithful monitor.

D. D. B., Johnstown, Pa. Please harmonize Matt. 11 : 7–14; Luke 7 : 27; Mark 9 : 11–13.

There was a prophecy that God would send Elijah or Elias to turn the hearts of the people (Mal. 4 : 5). When John appeared he was believed by many to be Elias reincarnate, but he denied this (John 1 : 21). The Jews expected that the literal Elijah, who is represented as having ascended to heaven (II Kings 2 : 11), would be sent to earth. John knew himself to be not Elias, but merely a humble messenger, a voice with no distinction, save that of "preparing the way." When Christ spoke of him, he settled the question definitely (Matt. 11 : 14). What the prophecy meant was not the reincarnation of Elias, but the coming of a prophet with the spirit of an Elias, before the coming of Christ; and according to Christ's own words, John was that Elias who was to come. Hence the account of the transfiguration (Mark 9 : 11–13) is nowise in conflict with the other passage about John as a prophet of the type and character of Elias.

Mrs. H. F. A., Plymouth, Wis. Matt. 5 : 39 has provoked much comment. What Christ evidently desired to convey was that the Christians were not to take the means of retaliation that were common among the Jews (as enumerated in the preceding verses), but were not to resist evil. The Christian, though surrounded by evil, must submit to much of it, even to gross injustice, for his Lord's sake. We do not see how this attitude can be applied to the prohibition question. The movement is one in which the Christian must needs take a strongly aggressive part, for that is one of the distinctive fights of light against darkness.

T. B. R., Belden, Ohio. 1. Many are interested to know why in the great European War there has been no exchange of prisoners, as in our Civil War. Is it cheaper to feed and care for them than to fight them? 2. Should the Allies be finally victorious and Palestine be taken from Turkish control, under whose control would it come, and would there in all probability be a large emigration of the Jews back to the land of their fathers? Some think perhaps the United States as a liberal power might be asked to give aid and direction to its social and governmental affairs.

1. The custom of exchanging able-bodied prisoners is by no means one common to all wars; in fact, historically, it may be said that it is rather rarely done. Our Civil War was an exception to the general rule. In the present war, no mention has been made of proposals to exchange able-bodied prisoners. 2. All discussion of the future control of Palestine is speculation. Whether or not there would be any large emigration thither of the Jews after the war, is impossible to tell at present, as it would largely depend on conditions obtaining after the war.

Mrs. S. E. B., of Dunellen, N. J., writes that the following poem was one of many that were written during the dark days of the Civil War. The author of the verses is H. W. Baker, and they might well have been written of the situation today:

O God of Love, O King of Peace,
Make wars throughout the world to cease;
The wrath of sinful man restrain;
Give peace, O God, give peace again!

Whom shall we trust but thee, O Lord?
Where rest but on thy faithful Word?
None ever called on thee in vain—
Give peace, O God, give peace again!

Where saints and angels dwell above,
All hearts are knit in holy love;
Oh, bind us in that heavenly chain!
Give peace, O God, give peace again!

Earnest Inquirer, Harrison Valley, Ohio. The passage in I Cor. 2 : 15 distinguishes between the spiritual or enlightened man and the natural or unenlightened man. Of the spiritual man it says that he judgeth ("discerneth" is the translation many prefer) all things; that is, he weighs them in his own mind with regard to their real spiritual worth, in order that he may help those who do wrong by setting them on the right track. Thus it is not judgment for condemnation that is meant, but rather understanding for helpfulness.

"A Minnesota Friend," who sent anonymously a gift of $20, to be divided equally between the Bowery Mission and the Christian Herald Gospel Tent, has our grateful acknowledgments for the gift.

J. S., Seattle, Wash. The passage in Ezek. 28 : 12, represents the King of Tyre in his former state of righteousness and justice, before he yielded to the gratifications of power, pride and sensual indulgence. The language used by the prophet is picturesquely figurative, drawn from the conception of man in Eden before the fall. "Sealest up the sum, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty," is interpreted to mean that the king excelled in qualities of mind, personal graces and accomplishments and in cultivated judgment and that he had thus great opportunities for serving God and the nation over which he ruled. Yet all these opportunities were wasted and he chose the evil rather than the good. The whole passage is really a prophetical dirge, ending with the prediction of the rejection and punishment of the degraded monarch.

WASHINGTON IN WAR TIME

BY ABBY GUNN BAKER

OUR national capital is at fever heat of patriotic war enthusiasm. Ever since that momentous night, or rather the gray hours of the coming morning of April 6, 1917, when at the behest of President Wilson Congress declared the United States to be at war with Germany, the war spirit has gained an acceleration and engendered a patriotism such as Washington has never witnessed in her history before. At first, after the war declaration, many people, even including some high officials of the government, found it hard to believe that our country was actually involved in the deadly European struggle. Many said lightly, "Oh, it does not mean the realities of war; it only means our moral support and financial help."

It required but a few days for the most indifferent observer to see the error of that view. Within a week after the declaration, all the government departments and government buildings at Washington were closed to the public. This was most noticeable at the White House and the executive offices. For weeks before this event, the rush of visitors at the White House offices was almost unprecedented, and in order to save his time, President Wilson quietly inaugurated a new order: he came to the executive offices only on cabinet days, Tuesdays and Fridays, and saw only those who had imperative business with him. These he met by appointment in the state parlors of the White House. The effect has been most marked in the change at the executive offices; for, aside from Tuesdays and Fridays, they are as deserted as the chambers of a briefless barrister.

IN all the great department buildings the doors are barred except at the main entrances, and there huge placards announce, "Closed to the Public." If one has business at any of the departments, he must run the gauntlet of inspection. He is admitted in the doorway by a guard; a long, improvised counter faces him, at which he is given a printed application on which he must write his own name and address and the name of the official he wishes to see; and he must state the nature of the business which brings him to the department. This is passed on to another official, and if the business is considered sufficiently urgent, the applicant is placed in charge of a soldier and conducted to the official he is to see.

The Navy Yard, the Barracks and all bridges leading into Washington are carefully guarded. At the Capitol, soldiers constantly patrol, and every visitor undergoes a close inspection by the guards at the doors. A special ticket is required for entrance into the Senate galleries, and the closest scrutiny is given those who are permitted into the lobbies of the building. At Fort Myer military companies are drilling incessantly, and it is a familiar sight to see the soldiers of the District militia, as well as the companies of the High School cadets, drilling in various parts of the city almost every day of the week.

The Conduit Road bridge, which carries the water supply into the city, is guarded day and night by a troop of soldiers. A little incident occurred out there the other day, which illustrates the spirit which, just now, is dominating the town. The first day or two after the soldier boys were stationed at the bridge, there was some hitch about the commissary supplies, and the soldiers' rations were decidedly scant. A lady who has a lovely suburban home near the camp learned of the state of affairs and at once busied herself. She called up the members of the section of the college women's club to which she belongs, and they came out in their autos and on street-cars, loaded down with coffee, doughnuts and other substantials. It is needless to say that those men suffered no more pangs of hunger while Uncle Sam's commissary was getting into commission.

IT is this spirit which is rife in the town. Never was there such a display of the national colors at the capital before. The Stars and Stripes float not only from all the government buildings, but every store and office building is fairly shadowed by the flags that hang from the windows. Everybody on the streets, man, woman and child, wears buttonhole flags, and not only carriages and autocars display the colors proudly, but every freight conveyer on the streets also flies them aloft.

Then, too, there is an air of suppressed excitement about the town which is electrical. The hotels are filled with strangers. "Munition-makers and ship-builders are here after the big contracts," some aver, and probably with good reason, for the government is letting some of the biggest contracts in its history. But the strangers who crowd the town are by no means confined to that class. A surprising number of patriotic, educational, and scientific societies have been in session here this spring, and it has been very noticeable that every one of them has adopted resolutions backing up the President and proffering its services to the country and Red Cross.

THE activities of the Red Cross Society, since the war declaration, have been tremendously increased. The National Society has recently moved into its new quarters—the building erected to the memory of the women of the American wars—but their work has already broadened so greatly that another building is being used; and a room in the building of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which the last congress of that organization offered the Red Cross, is about to be opened. Nearly all the churches of the city are cooperating with the society by organizing Red Cross units, and hundreds of smaller organizations and private individuals are busily engaged in the numberless enterprises of the society.

Another striking war indication is that recruiting stations have sprung up in every corner of the town. Tents, placarded on all sides with calls for recruits, are seen in various parts of Pennsylvania Avenue; empty storerooms are converted into recruiting stations, while the theaters are being opened at the noon hour and well-known statesmen and army officers make impassioned speeches urging enlistments. A newspaper company has installed an immense moving picture curtain on the outside of its building, and each evening gives an exhibition of Army and Navy scenes, and a well-known speaker every pleasant evening addresses the thousands who gather around the building.

Washington Union Station with the flags of three nations

Conference room at the MacVeagh residence used by British Commission

Photos copyright, Harris & Ewing

But it was the arrival of the British and French commissioners for the great international war council which gave the picturesque touch that brought the reality of the world-wide war to the national capital as nothing else could have done. Seemingly every automobile in the city was brought out to do them honor. Long before the train was due, the Union Station and the nearby streets were packed with eager spectators, while all over the city, as though by sudden and simultaneous inspiration, British and French flags were flung afloat beside the American colors. They waved in triumphant exultation from the tall flag-masts in front of the station, and, in much smaller dimensions, from the fronts of the hundreds of automobiles waiting in the vicinity.

President Wilson had appointed a committee to go to the Canadian border to meet the British commission and conduct them to Washington. On reaching the capital they were met by another official delegation, Secretary of State Lansing, Assistant Secretary Phillips, Counsellor Polk, and the President's military aide, Colonel W. W. Harts. The party was hurried through the cheering crowds to the autos which were in waiting and which were immediately surrounded by two troops of soldiers, who accompanied them and will do guard duty as long as the commission is in the city. Mr. Balfour and his immediate suite of ten were taken to the palatial residence on Sixteenth Street Heights, built by former Secretary of the Treasury Franklin MacVeagh. The house is now occupied by Mr. Breckinridge Long, Third Assistant Secretary of State, who placed it at the disposal of the government for the entertainment of the British commissioners. Fourteen other members of the commission were entertained at the Hotel Shoreham. Sir George Foster, acting prime minister of Canada, and Sir Joseph Pope, under secretary of internal affairs of the Dominion, joined the party and took part in the conferences in the big library of the MacVeagh house.

Equal honors were shown the French party upon their arrival the following Tuesday. They landed at Hampton Roads on Monday, where President Wilson had the presidential yacht Mayflower waiting to convey them to Washington. The French commission included former Premier Viviani; the hero of the Marne, Marshal Joffre; the senior vice-admiral of the French navy, P. L. A. Chocheprat; Marquis de Chambrun, member of the Chamber of Deputies; M. Simon, inspector of finance; M. Hovelacque, inspector general of public instruction; Lieutenant Colonel Fabry, chief of staff; Lieutenant Colonel Remond, general headquarters staff; Major Roquin, minister of war; Lieutenant de Tossan, Tenth army, and Major Dreyfus, medical corps. A committee of U. S. officials, accompanied by the French ambassador, M. Jusserand, and two attachés of the French embassy, were at the Roads to welcome them.

The Mayflower with the foreign guests reached the Navy Yard at noon on Tuesday. It was a perfect spring day. Every auto-owner at the national capital, apparently, had decorated his car with the French tricolor, the British ensign, and the Stars and Stripes, and was in line on the streets adjoining the Navy Yard to await the appearance of the party. Two troops of the Second U. S. Cavalry were in attendance. As the autocars containing the Frenchmen came into sight they were greeted with cheers. The ride that morning through the city to Mr. Henry White's residence in Crescent Place—which had been placed at the disposal of the government for the visitors—was a remarkable ovation for all of the Frenchmen. The Capitol grounds, the plaza and the Capitol steps were densely crowded with people who cheered continuously and the demonstration lasted all the way out to Crescent Place. The members of the British commission on the porches at the MacVeagh residence cheered as lustily as the Americans when the Frenchmen passed. The same schedule of official calls which was followed by the British commissioners was adhered to as scrupulously by the members of the French commission and equal honor was shown them by their American hosts. At the dinner of sixty covers which President Wilson gave for them as many ladies were present as men.

Before this story reaches print, the commissions at Washington will be augmented by representatives from all of the Allied powers. The importance of this war conference can scarcely be grasped by the people of the country. It marks a new step in our history as a nation and a new policy in our government. Never again can we go back to our former position of isolation in the affairs of the world. The Monroe Doctrine, as it is popularly understood, has, in the view of very many Americans, been wiped from the slate. This war conference marks our alliance inseparably with the Allied powers, and with them we must stand or fall in this cataclysm of war which has been brought upon the world.

This new alliance was exemplified very practically when, upon the second day of his stay at our capital, Sir Hardman Lever, financial secretary of the treasury of Great Britain, and Lord Cunliffe, with the British ambassador at Washington, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, completed the loan from our government, through Secretary McAdoo, of two hundred million dollars; and this is, of course, but the beginning of the vast loans our government will advance to the Allied powers.

Surely, as a people we must now realize that we have gone into this world war. With such stirring events taking place it can but be conceded that the Capitol City is no longer in theory, but is in actuality, the war center of the country.

A CENTURY OF SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK

THE American Sunday School Union is observing this month its centennial anniversary. This unique and distinctive organization was the first Sunday school missionary society founded, and through the hundred years of its activities has had a steady growth and achieved a remarkable record of results in the religious and social development of rural America.

The American Sunday School Union has founded about 120,000 Sunday schools, which is an average of almost four every day in its hundred years.

There are now more than 230 active field missionaries promoting the work. It is the particular work of these missionaries to establish and equip Sunday schools in communities which are without religious development.

The Union is nondenominational in form and interdenominational in its work. Almost all of the work is in undeveloped sections of the country, difficult of access, and many of the workers have experienced the most severe hardships. The Union blazes the trail into localities theretofore unreached by religious influence, and paves the way for denominational organizations to step in later on and continue the work along their own lines. It is the only agency that can bring together in common worship, Bible study and community service all the people of any neighborhood in which there are not enough residents of any one denomination to start a church or Sunday school of their own. The Sunday schools thus founded are maintained on a union basis only until such time as a majority of the members indicate a desire for a denominational affiliation. They are then free to express their preference without influence on the part of the Union; and when a permanent denominational connection has been effected, followed by the formation of a local church, the responsibility of the Union for the community has been transferred. Most of the Sunday schools thus established are the forerunners of regularly established churches of various denominations.

NOT all the evil and poverty in existence are confined to the slum districts of the great cities. Residents of the Eastern states who have lived all their lives in the towns or cities or in well-to-do farming communities have little or no conception of the true conditions in other parts of the country. They do not realize that there are hundreds of thousands of square miles of territory inhabited almost exclusively by people who are not well-to-do, who are not educated, who are not developing mentally or morally, and who never will develop until they have implanted in their minds the principles of righteous living and have received the divine inspiration of the Gospel.

An accurate survey made by one of the Union's missionaries revealed in a single county, in a Middle-West state, twenty-four church buildings which had been abandoned from one to twenty years. Similar conditions exist in many other sections. Hundreds of abandoned churches are to be found in nearly every state. And it has been established that as a rule, when a church goes down, the whole community begins to decline, followed usually by a gradual falling off in public school attendance and, in some cases, by actual abandonment of the schoolhouses. It has also been established that the social development of a community is almost invariably governed by its moral and spiritual development.

The people of the mountain districts of the South have the purest Anglo-Saxon blood in the world. The life of these people is full of tragedies and contrasts. Most of them are uneducated and many of them exceedingly rough. But when they are once converted, they remain loyal and enthusiastic Christians and seize every opportunity to improve their modes of living. The mountaineers, however, represent only one of the various classes of unenlightened humanity in the Southern states. In nearly all sections of the South are found the unemployed negroes and "poor whites." They constitute the greatest social problem of the country. Lack of education and ambition are the underlying causes of their condition. All around them are hundreds of thousands of acres of land either poorly cultivated or not cultivated at all. They know very little about agriculture in general and virtually nothing about intensive farming. The result is that they barely manage to exist.

AT the West, the states of Iowa, Nebraska, South Dakota and Wyoming have a combined population of about four and a quarter millions. The number thus far reached by Bible instruction is estimated as approximately 33 per cent., which means that 67 per cent. are outside the church. Probably 60 per cent. of this number live in rural communities, and it is to these people that the missionaries of the American Sunday School Union are sent.

The mining towns of Pennsylvania are populated largely by foreign-born people. The great majority of these miners and their families live in small, overcrowded houses without modern conveniences. Few of them know anything about sanitation. There are few social advantages, and the atmosphere is frequently charged with immoral influences dangerous to the young mind and heart. Under these conditions thousands of children are born and reared. Many of them are naturally bright and become very apt pupils in school. All they need to make them good, useful citizens is the proper moral training.

The Better Way

*A SERMON BY REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

TEXTS—Luke 15 : 12. "Give me." Luke 15 : 19. "Make me."

MY text is composed of four words. These four words are found in the parable of the Prodigal Son. The first two suggest darkness, for the one who speaks is self-willed, and to be self-willed is to drift inevitably into increasing gloom. The second two words are the beginning of glory, and an ever-increasing glory; for the one who speaks has passed out of the experience of self-will and stands at the threshold of a life lived with the surrendered will, and this always means inexpressible joy. The first two words are the outbreak of an inward condition, and the one who uses the expression is headed toward shame. The second two words are the climax of serious thought, and the one who is speaking has turned squarely about in his way of thinking and living, and his recovery is inspiring indeed.

It is a wonderful group of parables which we find in the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, and it is well to remember that these parables were spoken in answer to a sneer. The enemies of Jesus beheld him moving about in the midst of the crowds, talking to this one, helping the one who was in need of help, and sometimes sitting down to eat with those whose lives were marred and hurt by sin, and they said, "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." In the very way they said it there was a sort of hiss, as if they would do him harm if they could. The emphasis may also be placed upon the word "man," when they said, "this man receiveth sinners," for they would hurl an insult at him, and in the light of all that he had done they would rob him of his deity and brand him as an impostor. There was also the thought of scorn in the words they spoke, for they said, "this man receiveth sinners," and the emphatic word is "sinners"; for, misunderstanding his mission, they sought to accuse him of being one of the people with whom he associated.

IN the Old Testament, under the law, it was necessary for one who would be true to keep himself separated from sinners, and if the priest touched that which was unclean he must be cleansed before he could approach God; but in the New Testament, Christ, who is God manifested in the flesh, being full of compassion for those who thronged him as he walked, walks and talks and eats with men and women whose lives are just as far from God's plan as they can possibly be.

It is a trying experience to be misunderstood, to have one's motives questioned and one's spirit censured; but, notwithstanding the fact that Jesus was infinitely sensitive and easily grieved, how gentle he is in his answer to his enemies! How wonderful he is in his dealings with them! How patient he is under the lash of criticism!

Therefore, I say again, these three parables are given in answer to a sneer; for when his enemies would not understand him, he spoke to them these wonderful words found in the parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Money, and the Prodigal Son. There is nothing finer in language than these parables which Jesus used. Here is inspiration for the preacher; for we have a picture of God seeking the lost, restoring that which is out of position, and welcoming back the wanderer who has sinned against his love.

Here is hope for the sinner; for when the prodigal comes to himself, and in utter wretchedness determines to go back to his father's house, he is met with a welcome, saluted with a kiss, clothed with a robe, shod with shoes to protect his bleeding feet, has the ring placed on his finger, and is taken back again to the home from which, in self-will, he has turned away.

Here is a suggestion of that music of heaven which is always heard when the wanderer comes home. There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over repenting sinners; for the shepherd rejoices, the woman is made glad, and the father calls in his friends and neighbors to rejoice with him, because the lost is found.

OF the three parables, the third is the most wonderful. It is the most wonderful numerically. The first parable suggests a loss of one in a hundred, for one sheep had gone astray and ninety-nine were in the fold. The second parable suggests a loss of one in ten, for the woman has ten pieces of silver and misses one of them. The third parable suggests a loss of half of all that the father possessed, for he had two sons, and one of them went away from his home in wilful wandering.

It is also to be remembered that the first loss may be replaced, for the shepherd could buy another sheep. The second loss could be explained, for if this piece of silver lost was a part of the betrothal gift which was made to the woman when she became a bride, as some have supposed, she could have explained to her husband that, through no carelessness of her own, the piece of silver was gone. But the third loss is too great to be replaced, too crushing to be explained; for all that the old father can do is to cry out with a sob, "My son! My son!"

What a picture is here presented of the way God deals with the sinner! When the sheep is lost the shepherd goes seeking, and he seeks until he finds it. When the coin is lost, the woman sweeps the house until the lost is found: but when the boy is lost, the father can only sit still in the house and suffer. He must not send his servant to bring the boy back. He cannot even go himself to plead with him to return; for had the boy come back unchanged, he would have been a prodigal still; so the father waits until the boy is willing, and then he goes forth to meet him.

So our Father cannot save us against our wills, but the moment we are willing, though our sins may have been like scarlet, he will receive us, and our sins may be blotted out.

The prodigal was free to go away, and he was also free to come back, and so he said in the first text, "Give me." This is the climax of self-will and of a life of disobedience; but when he has sinned grievously, and his heart is wellnigh broken, he has the power to say "Make me," and he starts back again to a life of peace and happiness.

If you have the power to choose evil—and of course you have—you have also the power to choose that which is good; and when you choose the good, which finds its climax in Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour, the cords of sin will be broken and the light of glory will begin to flood your soul.

TIRED of the restraints of home, and of the watchfulness of his father's eye, the younger son determined to see the world for himself, and so he said, "Give me." And that is the starting-point of all evil.

The other day there came to my table an English publication, and on one of the pages I found these two texts, and therefore I am indebted to the English preacher who, using them, gave his message to the church; but beyond the text and a few sentences which I quote, the appeal is my own.

According to the Jewish law of inheritance, if there were two sons, the elder must receive two portions, and the younger a third of all the property. The younger son was entitled by law to his share. He had no right, however, to claim it during his father's lifetime. "And the younger of them said to his father, 'Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me.' And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living" (Luke 15 : 12, 13).

The down grades of life are generally steep and short and this prodigal boy plunged into the depths very quickly. The expression, "wasted his substance with riotous living," literally means "throwing one's substance away in madness." When you give this request which he made of his father its spiritual significance, it is the expression of a man's desire to be independent of God and to lay out his life according to his own will. It is also the expression of the desire of one who wishes to take the ordering of his life into his own hands.

"When the evil of the world is tracked to its source," it will be found that it has its start in self-will, and this prodigal boy is a picture of all who have made life a failure. He is also a picture of one who feels no sense of obligation to God, who treats God as a convenience, who believes in him or not as he pleases, who accepts his blessings without saying "Thank you," who lives his life without prayer, who has no thought of gratitude for the power of vision, for perfect health, for an unbroken family circle, and for all that makes life worth while.

This boy is also a picture of one who has no recognition of the rights of others; of one who lives a life of pure selfishness; who never stops for a moment to lift another's burden or wipe away another's tears; who thanks God that he is not as other men are, and is entirely unmindful of the fact that all that is good in his life he owes to some one else, and for all the protection of his life he is indebted to God.

Somebody has said that hell is selfishness set on fire. Sin has been described as the wrong use of a man's passions or powers given to him of God that they might be used for his glory, and supposed to be held in sacred trust. There is no one of us who has not a great equipment. We have minds with which to think, hearts with which to love, hands with which to lift, feet with which to run on errands of mercy, influence to make life easier for others; and yet, all unmindful of these things, like the prodigal of old we live for ourselves, and our talents are wrapped in napkins. They profit us little, they profit the world nothing, and one day we shall be called to an account.

THE true life can never be lived until the selfish prayer, "Give me," gives way to the better prayer, "Make me." When the prodigal was once awakened he was willing to begin at the very bottom of the ladder and climb up. He was ready to take the position of a hired servant if only he could be once more in the presence of his father.

It is the lesson we all must learn before we can be what God would have us be. If I am willing, God can do for me the following great things: He can not only make me clean, but he can keep me clean. A mother permits her child to go forth to play in the morning, and the child returns at noon with hands soiled and garments unclean. The mother has told her child to keep clean, and the child meant to do so, but could not. But if the mother could have placed her spirit within the child, so that he would have not only the desire but the power to keep clean, that would have been far better. This is exactly what God will do for me, if I place myself in his hands. He will both command and equip; he will set before me the ideal and give me strength to reach it. He can make me triumphant in the time of temptation.

He can make us to be filled with peace in the time of conflict. Peace is the opposite of contention. It is the opposite of strife and unrest. It is what the world cannot give, neither take away. It belongs to us when we are living in fellowship with him.

He can make us victorious in the time of sorrow; our burdens may be heavy, but they cannot crush us; tears may be hot, but they cannot blind us; the storms may be severe, but the harbor is near at hand; the night may be dark, but the morning cometh.

These experiences always belong to the one whose times are in God's hands.

As a matter of fact, the prodigal really did not say "Make me" when he came into his father's presence. He only thought that he would say it, but that is good enough; for if one be willing, God will do the rest. "For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not" (II Cor. 8 : 12).

His vision was interrupted when he reached his father's presence, and interrupted just at the right point. He willed to go away, now he wills to come back; and that is all that is required. "And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand and shoes on his feet" (Luke 15 : 20 22).

ALL that God requires is your will, and he cannot save you until you are willing; neither can he bless you so long as you are in any sense rebellious.

He will not require of you that which is disagreeable. If my child should give me the privilege of ordering her life for a day, I would make her day a very happy one. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." We shall be filled with joy just in proportion as we allow him to choose for us, and just in proportion as we walk carefully in the way he marks out before us.

The only life that is worth while is that which is lived in harmony with the will of God. If you are in the darkness, the darkness will become light around you when you say, "Not my will, but thine, be done." If you are bearing burdens, you will find the burden lifted, or you will find yourself equipped with strength to bear it easily, when you say "Not my will, but thine, be done." If the night is dark about you, you will find stars of hope appearing, or you will have given to you songs in the night, which shall be songs of victory, when you say, "Not my will, but thine, be done." If you are living a life of sin, you will find your sins pardoned and put away, forgiven and forgotten of God, when you say, "Nay, but I yield, I yield; I can hold out no more."

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

The President, Governors and Members of the Council of National Defense at the White House on May 1

THE LIBERTY LOAN OF 1917. The first offering of the $7,000,000,000 bond issue recently authorized was announced by Secretary McAdoo on May 2, the amount offered being $2,000,000,000. Subscriptions are to be made through the 27,513 national and state banks, and will be received until June 15, after which allotment will be made to subscribers. The bonds will bear date of July 1, with interest at three per cent. payable January 1 and July 1. The maturities and denominations are still to be announced; the loan is to be a popular one, and bonds will be sold in denominations as low as $20. The loan has been called the "Liberty Loan," because it is a part of the great effort which the United States feels that it is making in the interest of world liberty. The $2,000,000,000 issue is the largest single issue ever made by the United States. It was announced that the next loans to the Allies would be temporary loans of $100,000,000 each to Italy and France. Belgium is also reported to have asked for $150,000,000, and Russia is to receive early financial assistance. The amount which the United States may be called upon to loan its allies monthly is estimated at $400,000,000.

U-BOAT DANGER SERIOUS. The veil was drawn aside on the U-boat question on May 2 by the President and Secretaries Lane, Lansing and Daniels in conferences with a joint meeting of the Council of National Defense and the governors of several states, forty states being represented, by their governors or by delegates. According to Secretary Lane, German U-boats in the week preceding May 2 had destroyed 400,000 tons of shipping. Chairman Denman of the Federal Shipping Board placed the sinkings at 300,000 tons. He also told the delegates that the world's estimated ship tonnage in 1916 was 50,000,000 tons. The entire loss in tonnage during 1916 was a little more than 2,000,000 tons, while the world's ship construction was slightly less than that figure. Mr. Denman said the seriousness of the situation was apparent. Secretary Lane said: "The best minds of America directed on the proposition of how to meet the submarine menace may rescue us, and I say 'us' because many do not seem to realize that this is our war as much as it is the war of England and France. If this keeps up for any length of time, it will lay England and France prostrate unless we are able to come to their support or some measure is devised to put the submarine out of business." A Brazilian inventor was recently reported as having put into the hands of British and American authorities an invention which promised to successfully combat the submarine. American inventors are also reported as working on devices, electrical and otherwise, with which it was hoped to meet the submarine danger. In the meantime, German and Austrian ships seized in American ports are being rapidly made ready for sea, 71 ships of a total tonnage above 500,000 being promised in five months. Contracts have already been let for the building of wooden vessels, under the Shipping Board's plan, on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The first of these is expected to be delivered in four months, after which they will be launched rapidly. The department of labor has registered 15,000 skilled shipwrights who will help build the ships. The building of steel vessels will also be pushed by every possible measure, it being probable that all other building construction will be subordinated to the shipbuilding program. According to J. Bernard Walker, editor of the Scientific American, Germany on May 1 had not fewer than 500 submarines of the U-53 type approaching completion, and within six months would have 700 submarines afloat and in twelve months 1,200.

SECOND TORPEDO FATAL. The American ship Rockingham, which, as the Nebraskan, was torpedoed without sinking earlier in the war, was sunk by a submarine on May 1 en route from Baltimore to Liverpool. Patrol boats picked up thirty-three of her officers and men, and at last reports one boat was still missing. Loss—3 dead, 13 missing. Captain Harris, five naval gunners and two others of the crew of the tank steamship Vacuum have reached a British port. Lieutenant Thomas with four of his gunners was still missing at this writing.

AMERICAN TROOPS TO FRANCE. As the result of urgent requests by Major General G. T. M. Bridges and Marshal Joffre, it was reported from Washington on May 2 that a detachment of American troops would be sent to France as soon as the problem of shipping to transport them could be solved. General Joffre based his plea largely upon the assurance that the sight of the Stars and Stripes floating beside the tricolor on the battlefields of France would help to convince the German soldiers of the reality of America's participation in the war and thereby tend to break the morale of the German forces. It was admitted, however, that men as men and fighters were needed and could be used to good advantage. Military experts of the two commissions were also in agreement as to the advisability of sending American troops promptly instead of holding them in training on this side, referring to the experience of Canada, which found it necessary to give its soldiers training behind the lines in France. President Wilson on April 30 ordered the officers of the Reserve Corps already commissioned into the active service of the country; 3,500 men had received commissions up to that time, 875 new officers being named on April 28. On May 1 it was announced that the total recruited for the army in April was 40,258 men; the enlisted strength of the navy had been raised to 86,326, only 700 below the war quota; and the marine corps was recruited to its authorized strength of 17,400. Both the marine corps and the navy were, however, continuing recruiting, as bills pending in Congress and almost certain to pass fixed the strength of the navy at 150,000 and the marine corps at 30,000. Very little time will be lost in the registration of men eligible for the draft after the final passage of the bill.

THE NATIONS LINE UP. Mexico, according to special dispatches to the New York Times, will remain neutral in the great war, with the possibility that she may take her stand with the United States, there being a powerful movement in Mexico in favor of breaking relations with Germany. This attitude is said not to be due to any love of America, but because of the economic necessities of Mexico. Guatemala on April 28 broke diplomatic relations with Germany and handed passports to the German minister. After breaking relations with Germany, Brazil decided to remain neutral. Peking dispatches of April 29 declared that China would declare war against Germany within a fortnight. Chili broke relations with Germany on May 3.

CENSORSHIP AT WORK. A military censorship over submarine cables and over telegraph and telephone lines across the Mexican border was put into effect by the army and navy on May 1 under an executive order issued by President Wilson on April 28.

CARRANZA PRESIDENT OF MEXICO. Elected by a majority of more than 800,000 popular votes, the largest ever cast in the history of Mexico, Venustiano Carranza on May 1 with the solemn words "I swear it," took office as President of the republic after four years of civil war. Carranza's next task will be to substitute civil government for military rule.

OUR FIRST WAR BUDGET. The Appropriations Committee of the House on April 30 reported the first great war budget in the present conflict, carrying a total appropriation of $2,699,485,281.18. The army is to receive approximately $2,192,000,000, the navy approximately $503,000,000. Appropriations are made also for sea coast cannon and for the protection of the Panama Canal.

WORLD MAY HUNGER. Washington dispatches of April 27 reported that the Allies of the United States needed ships, food, munitions and money from this country, but the emphasis was on ships and food. The French reported that information in their hands indicated that 20,000,000 of the German poor were already in distress, while Italy, France and England were seriously threatened with shortage of necessary foods. Even Russia, usually self-sufficient, was said to be facing a decreased acreage through lack of the labor of the men at the front. King George on May 2 signed a proclamation exhorting the people of England to lessen their consumption of wheat. On April 20 a resolution was offered in the House at Washington, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to exercise broad powers over the sale, distribution and conservation of the nation's food supply, with an appropriation of $20,000,000 for an investigation of the food situation and the distribution of seed and food products. The measure restricts the wasting, hoarding or conserving of food products in such a way as to create artificially high prices. Similar bills were introduced into the Senate. A bill was introduced in the House on May 3 which would empower the President to fix maximum and minimum prices for food, clothing, fuel and other necessities, and the articles required for their production. The measure is intended to prevent speculation and unfair profits. Arrangements have been made whereby Canada and the United States will cooperate in the control of the food supply. Rains through the middle west in the last week of April were reported to have increased the probable yield of wheat by 5,000,000 bushels. Efforts were not lessened, however, for the planting of every available acre in the spring wheat states. School boards throughout the country are releasing young men students, giving them full credit for their term's work in order that they may work on the farms, the boys and girls alike are being encouraged to lend their strength to the nation for the production of food. On May 2, President Schulteis of the Swiss Federation gave the Associated Press a comprehensive statement of the situation within his nation, the statement being stimulated by the fear that the United States would place an embargo on food shipments to neutrals during the war. Switzerland is absolutely dependent upon food received from the United States through French and Italian ports. American people are urged by Herbert Hoover and by other food experts to make wider use of corn in order that wheat may be sent to those nations abroad which have not yet learned the manifold uses of America's greatest cereal. Mr. Hoover is quoted as stating that, with normal crops, Germany and Austria would be able to feed their people for at least two years. Sweden, because of a shortage of rye and wheat flour, is planning to use oat and barley flour in the making of bread. Germany is reported as planning to place under intensive cultivation every acre of land within the empire. The U. S. Senate on May 1 passed a bill appropriating $10,000,000 for the purchase by the government of nitrates for fertilizing purposes for distribution at cost to farmers of the Atlantic seaboard. It was declared that by proper use of these nitrates the corn and cotton crops could be increased from fifty to one hundred per cent.

Commends Alien Citizens. Attorney General Gregory on May 6 stated that it had been necessary to arrest only 125 aliens under the President's proclamation. The Attorney General said: "The foreign-born citizens of America as a class deserve the highest commendation and praise for the manner in which they have conducted themselves since the declaration of war against Germany. As regards law and order, they have in almost all instances been with the government and have vindicated the President's oft-repeated assertion that he had no misgivings as to how foreign-born Americans would measure up to their responsibilities and duties in the event of a national crisis."

Fragments of News. The Senate on May 1 approved the bill which had already passed the House permitting the Allies to recruit their citizens in the United States. . . . Major General Wotherspoon, Superintendent of Public Works of New York state, on May 1 urged a greater utilization of the canal systems of the country in the movement of foods and other products. He stated that the water system of New York state could handle 10,000,000 tons of freight a month more cheaply and more expeditiously than the present average of freight movement by rail. . . . The Argentine government on May 2 received a note from the German government expressing regret for the sinking of the Argentine ship Monte Protegido and promising reparation. . . . The Administration Espionage or Spy Bill was under severe attack in both houses of Congress on the first and second of May, especially that portion which would restrict the liberties of the press. The House passed the bill May 4 by a vote of 260 to 105, after rejecting the censorship article and replacing it with one less drastic. . . . Later reports from Constantinople showed that the American mission colleges were being granted every facility for the continuance of their work and would not be closed. . . . The Pennsylvania Railroad Company announced on May 1 that it had taken the first steps toward the mobilization of women workers to fill the places of men in its service where the change is practicable. The Lehigh Valley and Lackawanna Railroads had previously taken similar action. Women will be used in the lighter forms of machine shop work, train dispatching, signaling, ticket selling and car cleaning, while stenography, typewriting and practically all kinds of clerical work will be open to them. . . . The Superior Court in Arizona on May 2 ended the contest over the election of the governor, seating Thomas Campbell, Republican candidate, who had been officially declared elected, but whose election had been contested. . . . Bakers throughout the east advanced the price of bread twenty-five per cent. on May 1.

Russia and the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

IN spite of the rather severe fighting on the western front during the past week the submarine campaign and the Russian situation are the dominant features of the war.

The possible results of the political situation in Russia do not seem to be, as yet, at all understood by most Americans.

All the reports we have had in the past week from Russia seem to indicate that the disintegrating process in her army and navy is far advanced and is being accelerated by the decrees of the provisional government.

It has, for instance, been ordered by this government that hereafter soldiers shall no longer salute their officers; that the men of each army corps, regiment, battalion, and company shall elect committees from their own number, which committees shall be charged with the discipline, the provisioning, and practically all of the strategy and tactics of the army, as well as the settlement of all disputes between officers and men; and further that the men shall have the right to strike even against the decisions of these committees.

The political situation also, in Russia is chaotic. On Monday, April 30 there were very considerable disorders in the Russian capital. Bombs were thrown, and one prominent victim fell—Major General Kashtalinski. May Day, May 1, passed quietly, according to the dispatches, but disorder increased on the following days.

We are told by cables coming through London and subjected to censorship, that angry crowds of workmen and soldiers stormed the palace, which is the headquarters of the provisional government, and demanded the resignation or elimination from that government of Professor Milukoff, the minister of foreign affairs, threatening to overthrow the entire government unless their demands were complied with. The principal grievance appeared to be the note of the provisional government to the Allied powers in which it proclaimed Russia's fealty to the Entente. The soldiers' deputies claimed that this action was taken without consultation with them and demanded full participation in the councils of the government. Later dispatches told of the return of the rioting soldiers to their barracks and of conferences between delegates from the soldiers' and workmen's councils and the provisional government which were still continuing as this was written.

If Milukoff and his adherents of the "Intelligencia" party, the only party in Russia now in sympathy with the aims and objects of the Allies in the present war, are driven from any participation in the provisional government, it is quite possible that Russia may no longer be, even formally, a factor in the war.

As to the submarine menace, Lord Percy of the British mission, now in Washington, has stated that 22 per cent. of Great Britain's total tonnage of merchant ships are directly in the military or naval service, 34 per cent. have been requisitioned for various services by the government, 23 per cent. are working under an agreement to reserve from 50 to 80 per cent. of cargo space for government uses, which leaves only about 21 per cent. free for ordinary commercial purposes. In regard to the submarine sinkings, Lord Percy has said that it could not be stated too emphatically that the situation is serious. Actual statistics as follows reached us during the week: From Norway we were informed that 75 Norwegian ships had been sunk during the past week, and Great Britain's official figures of the number of British vessels sunk in the war zone around the British Isles were 38 vessels of over 1,600 tons, 13 of less than 1,600 tons, and eight fishing vessels. British vessels sunk elsewhere and Allied or neutral vessels sunk anywhere are not included in these figures.

In the Caucasus the indications are that the Russians are on the eve of a general retreat. They have already abandoned Mush, and the Turks have taken possession.

The British in Mesopotamia reported driving the Turkish thirteenth army corps out of the positions in which they had entrenched themselves on both sides of the Shatt el Adham, 25 miles southwest of Kiffi, in April. The Turks were driven back into the Jacob Hamrin hills. The British took 359 prisoners in this fight. South of Gaza, in Southern Palestine, the British also claim to have gained local successes.

General Petain, who commanded at Verdun, has been appointed chief of staff at the French ministry of war. This means practically that General Petain becomes commander-in-chief of the French army.

Until the end of the week under consideration the western front was rather quiet, neither the British nor French making any serious effort to continue their offensive. But toward the end of the week, to be exact on Thursday, May 3, the British began a fresh attack on the German lines of the northern part of that portion of the active western battle line held on the twelve-mile front from west of Queant to the north of Fresnoy. Fresnoy, the northern point of this fighting line, lies a little short of a mile to the east of Arleux-en-Gohelle, and a little over a mile directly north of Oppy, the scene a few days ago of such a determined struggle. Almost directly south of Oppy, but on the southern side of the Scarpe River and perhaps four miles from this stream, is Cherisy, and three miles still farther south is Bullecourt. The British reported that the enemy again employed large reserves of men and guns, and repeatedly delivered counter-attacks practically along the whole front, suffering heavy losses, and in the face of obstinate resistance their troops penetrated a sector of the Hindenburg line west of Queant, and maintained themselves there, capturing the village of Fresnoy, whose position is above described, and also the German positions on a front north and south thereof of two miles.

The Germans admit the loss of Fresnoy and a portion of their foremost trenches near Bullecourt.

The French delivered a powerful blow northwest of Rheims on May 4, taking the dominating height of Craonne and the first German line on a front of two and one-half miles, with some 750 prisoners, continuing the movement on May 5, and making farther captures of men, terrain and material.

MOUNTAINEERING IN THE PHILIPPINES

BY MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

THIS morning I awoke to the crackle of resinous knots in the great fireplace. The air was cool and bracing. Outside, the breezes stirred the giant pines whose mast-like trunks reached high into the air in a vain attempt to look over the thousand-foot cliff against which our log rest-house nestles in a bed of ferns.

We are on the mountain trail of Benguet, in Northern Luzon, in the Philippines, resting in a rest-house which deserves the name. Roughing it in Northern Luzon is what Irvin Cobb would call "de luxe." Rich, flavory oyster stew, fricasseed chicken, tender peas, sweet potatoes, tea, blueberries and hot biscuits and honey are all we have had for lunch, but we had all we could eat, and the Filipino cook is the best cook and the tidiest housekeeper in the Philippines, which is going some. To appreciate the cool shade of the lofty pines and the clean, rustic charm of our pine palace of repose, we must shoot back to Manila and begin our trip by auto in the delightful cool of morning.

Several men with whom I had expected to have interviews were either out of Manila or in the hospital, and things seemed to be moving in a circle. Then, one morning, I read that Director of Education Marquardt, Professor R. M. McElroy of Princeton and others were to make a tour of inspection of the schools in the Igorote and Ifugao districts north of Baguio, and I proceeded, as diplomatically as possible, to "butt in."

NOT since I returned from the "rose-red city, half as old as time," far to the south-east of the Dead Sea, have I had such a trip. I caught sight of Director Marquardt at Teachers' Camp at Baguio, a Chautauquan paradise where dull lecturers have to rustle their own audience, but where every teacher must learn the latest dance. Aside from Professor McElroy and Director Marquardt, my companions have been Mr. Verne E. Miller of the Philippine Education Company, Professor C. R. Moss, Supervising Teacher for Benguet, Dr. Alejandro Albert, Assistant Director of Education, and Christian Skattebol, Superintendent of Schools for the Mountain Province.

We are traveling in the wilds, where a few years ago head-hunters made gruesome collections. There are pythons here and wild boar and other game in plenty, none of which I have seen trace of as yet. Tomorrow we reach Bontoc, whence we go out for a visit to Bishop Brent's school at Sagada, and then take the rough trail south through the Banaue valley, where the industrious Ifugaos have covered the hillsides with rice terraces, which represent primitive man's greatest conquest of nature.

It is ten hours by auto from Manila to the summer capital of the Philippines at Baguio, one hundred and seventy-five miles away and five thousand feet higher up, where blankets are needed in summer.

For fifty kilometers from Manila the big seven-passenger car in which Mr. Miller, his twelve-year-old son, Professor McElroy and myself traveled rolled luxuriously over the fine roads through towering arches of cocoanut palms, mango trees and fire trees (which become a mass of red blossoms) over old Spanish bridges and modern concrete ones spanning shady, curving streams in which derrick-like fishing nets rose above the boats, which lay idly at anchor in the warm radiance of the morning light.

We passed thousands of nipa huts, with thatched roofs, built up on stilts so as to keep them dry in the heavy rains, and to afford a shady retreat for the razor-backed porkers with long snouts like their wild ancestors, and the spindly-legged game roosters with shiny plumage, slender necks and heads, and boastful crows—the sporting animals of the islands.

In every town there is a Catholic church, its steeple topping the view and its whitewashed or kalsomined walls crumbling through the ravages of time in a humid climate. Farther on, towns are fewer, and the heat beats into one's face in hot gusts, while the baked fields seem almost barren, except for cogon grass or weeds. For miles we did not see a house, and the only sign of life was the wavering rush of crowded motor cars, which dash by at frenzied speed. After passing a toll bridge, which collapses when the rainy season makes heavy bamboo rafts necessary, we turned aside from the main road and visited the North Luzon Agricultural College at Las Munos.

THE school is not a show place but a workshop, and its director, Mr. Moe, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, is working with ideas rather than expensive equipment. Tuition is free, and each boy earns his food by working at productive labor at the rate of three cents an hour, with meals costing four cents each. The boys not only build their own buildings but have set up a machine shop with a discarded traction engine, which cost fifty dollars, dismounted and made to drive the machines. The moving picture machine and the stereopticon are used regularly, and six miles of irrigation canals bring water from the near-by hills.

As yet it is a barren place, for if only one farm irrigates, the bug population of the county hold a convention and festival in its crop beds; but by cooperating with the homesteaders, additional fields are now being irrigated, and an era of prosperity is setting in. Nicholas Ruiz, a former teacher, at eleven dollars a month, made $2,500 last year through the knowledge he gained at Las Munos, and a higher standard of living is inevitable.

The school is not an experiment station but a college. Its extension work exerts a wide influence, however, as its graduates emigrate to the fertile plateau of Mindanao and many other places. At the end of this month a big fair is to be held, which will stimulate new interest in scientific agriculture.

There is no attempt made to rush things. Expensive machinery means spare time and laziness in many cases and bankruptcy in others. Since the native method of rice culture yields four times as much rice as the American method, there is no movement to change. The school gives no certificate at graduation, but after one year of successful work a diploma is awarded. "Make good first and then hang out your shingle" is the motto.

After leaving Las Munos the road runs as straight as a die for miles on end. Then comes the famous Benguet Road, fifteen miles long, one of the finest mountain roads in the world, over which the sturdy automobile trucks carry freight and passengers from the hot plain to the cool summer resort. It was surveyed by army experts, who said it would cost $75,000. So far, it has cost forty times that amount, and frequent slides and washouts add to the total cost annually.

DEAN C. WORCESTER, discovered Baguio, but Governor-General Taft made it famous. He had not been well in Manila and had been advised to go to Baguio, which was then just becoming prominent as a health resort. He made the trip in safety, and was so greatly relieved that he cabled the good news home, telling how quickly the horse he rode had transported the "big man of the Philippines" from hot plain to cool plateau. Some one in Washington had a sense of humor, for the answer was, "Good. How's the horse?"

Baguio is not a place, but a collection of places, separated by pine-clad hills and lovely valleys. Mrs. McElroy was at Camp John Hay, two miles from the hotel, and the professor and I set out after dinner to find her. The moon was bright and nearly

Near and Therefore Overlooked

SUNDAY, May 20. Acts 17 : 27. "He is not far from any one of us." And that is perhaps why he is so commonly overlooked. A thing may be so near to us that it is never seen. It is possible to be more familiar with the Black Forest, thousands of miles away from our home, than we are with the wood that runs wild at our very door. We may be more arrested by the wild-flowers in Switzerland, which perhaps we see only once in a decade, than we are with the flowers that cover our own fields.

When the Lord speaks to us in an occasional earthquake our awe is awakened, and we turn to him in trembling fear. But he speaks to us every day in the gentle voice that would "check each fault, and calm each fear," and the voice is so near and constant that we do not hear it. Our Lord is near us in the secret, mystic impulsion which would constrain us to change our way; but the gentle knocking is so persistent that we do not heed it. And again he would make known to us the nearness of his presence in inward promptings of dissatisfaction, in movements of disquietude, in disturbing shadows which he throws upon the soul. Yes, there is many a shadow falls upon our secret life, and we interpret it to mean that we are not well, or that we are overworked, or that we are in need of a change, when all the time it is "the shadow of the Almighty," and we do not recognize his presence.

And God the Father has appeared to us in Jesus Christ our Saviour, and if only our souls were fully awake and our eyes were open, we should behold him everywhere. I walked along Fifth Avenue the other day, with the deliberate purpose of noting the signs in buildings, and in services, and in people, that the Lord was near, and I was amazed at the many signs of his presence. And perhaps we have thus to deliver ourselves from the bonds of blinding familiarity by deliberately exercising our eyes in the vision of the nearness of God. As the apostle counsels, we must have our senses "exercised to discern," not forgetting that our eyes must also be "anointed with the eye-salve of grace." Let us believe that God is not far from any one of us, and then let us watch and pray, and we shall delight in his appearing. J. H. J.

The World-Wide Kingdom

MONDAY, May 21. Luke 13 : 29. "And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God." Nothing in Jesus' teaching of the kingdom of God was so difficult for the people of his time to understand and to accept as its catholicity. After these centuries of Christian teaching many of us are slow to take in the full implication of such words as these. The "east and west and north and south" of Jesus' words represent vastly more than geographical sections, points of the compass. He was always speaking in figures, and these words are clearly a parable by which he would enlarge our conception of the church. The church is the earthly side of the kingdom of heaven, as the kingdom of heaven is the celestial side of the church.

The man who asked Jesus, "Are there few that be saved?" may have believed in the exclusive election of his own race or sect. He could not have been sincere, however, for Jesus evaded the question, and Jesus never turned away a candid truth-seeker without satisfying his inquiry. Christ admits to his kingdom many whom we would exclude. Perhaps he excludes many whom we would admit. "East and west and north and south" represent diverse temperaments, varieties of religious experience, disparities in modes of worship. In the fulness of time the church will become as catholic as its Master. Certainly no church is that now. In our excessive zeal for conformity to our type of piety, let us not forget that our type is not the ultimate type unless it be the Master's type. And the Master must be the judge of that. "The Lord knoweth them that are his." No clique or cult, no council or synod, keeps the doors of the kingdom. The King himself says, "I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved." C. C. A.

The Name of the Lord

TUESDAY, May 22. Prov. 18 : 10. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe." Whatever name of God the sacred writer may have had in mind, it must have been one that suggested to him security from danger. He has found in God a wisdom that he could appropriate and so drive out his foolishness and ignorance, a power from which his weakness could draw strength, a mercy that seemed to be actually attracted by his misery, a love that was determined to take the greatest risks for his safety. All these qualities in God now become to the believer who has an experimental knowledge of them the very name of God. He will call his God by means of these virtues, which he has discovered in him; because these virtues express what God is, and that is what a name is for. Thus known and thus named, God becomes to the believer the citadel into which he hurried in the warfare of this life, when the battle becomes too hot and the enemies seem to gain on him. The gates of the citadel stand open, or swing open at the call of faith. He knows the password and is admitted at once as he comes running from his pursuers. What is this name of the Lord that is thrown around us as a strong protecting wall, as a fortress in which we are secure from all harm? It is the name that was breathed over our infant frame in holy baptism, that we were taught to lisp at our mother's knee, that was unfolded to us in its inexhaustible meaning during our study of the Bible: Jesus.

"Jesus, only name that's given
Under all the mighty heaven,
Whereby man, to sin enslaved,
Bursts his fetters, and is saved.
Jesus! Name of wondrous love!
Human name of God above;
Pleading only this we flee,
Helpless, O our God, to thee."

The Loneness of Jesus

WEDNESDAY, May 23. John 16 : 32. "And shall leave me alone." No human friend could help Christ in his Gethsemane agony. "Ye cannot follow me now." They could not know the meaning of the crimson drops that gleamed like rubies on his brow. Therefore Jesus said, "Sleep on, and take your rest, while I alone suffer for your redemption." At that time Judas was selling him; Mary, Martha and the mother of Jesus were at home; God the Father was getting ready to turn his face of love away from his only begotten Son, that Christ might feel the pangs of being forsaken by all the beings of the universe which he himself had created.

No one else could drink that cup of woe to its dregs but Jesus. He went down into the depths to tread the winepress of wrath alone, that he might lift humanity up to the heavenly heights of holiness.

Of his people there were none with him when his feet and hands and side bled for the remission of sins. Therefore he is red in his apparel; his holy of holies is a red room where we find peace by the blood, where even the touch of his robe sends a thrill of life through every believing soul.

Christ's dearest disciples failed to understand his mission and the wonderful manner of its achievement. They could not comprehend his divine greatness. To many he was only the carpenter's son, the homeless prophet, the strange preacher; longing for sympathy, Christ would say, "Lovest thou me?" "Will ye also go away?" Jesus seemed to live in an Alpine loneliness, above humanity; but it was there he held converse with the Father and felt the comfort of ministering attendants. The strength of the hills was his, for heaven touched earth on those heights.

The End of the Commandment

THURSDAY, May 24. I Tim. 1 : 5. "The end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." These words are more simply stated elsewhere: "Love is the fulfilling of the law." The law is virtually "the whole duty of man." That is to say, love is the end and ultimate of Christian duty. There is no duty we owe to men individually or collectively, which is not expressed or implied in the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

As Mark Hopkins points out in his "Law of Love and Love as a Law," life is a series of concentric circles. Draw a little circle around your personality, and it will include your family; draw a larger circle and it will include your friends; a still larger circle takes in your fellow countrymen; the last and largest circle of all embraces all humanity. As the circle enlarges, the objects of our love increase in number and the intensity of our love naturally diminishes. We are not bound to all mankind as strongly or as tenderly as we are to our fellow countrymen. We are not bound to do for all our countrymen as much as we are bound to do for our neighbors next door or on the next street or in the next township. Our highest human obligation is to those of our own household. The supreme duty we owe to One and One alone. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God."

There is a movement in modern life known as internationalism. Its devotees put the flag of humanity above the flag of their country. In effect, such people are in danger of seeking to do good for a great cause by doing violence to a smaller cause. The progress of civilization, the onward and upward march of humanity, has not been by such a method. The end of the commandment is not love alone, but "love out of a pure heart and of a good conscience and of faith unfeigned." Christian love is love derived from and guided by rational faith and duty. The truest internationalism does not abolish nationalism. Genuine patriotism does not forbid friendship. Real friendship does not interfere with family love. Unselfish family love is never in collision with the love that crowns Jesus Christ the Lord of all. C. C. A.

The Far Vision

FRIDAY, May 25. Ps. 104 : 24. "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches." To obtain the true perspective for this cry of wonder and admiration one must mount to the point of lookout which the writer of this psalm occupies. He beholds the earth spread out before him in its created glory: the cloud-capped mountains rising majestically from their base in the wide plains, and the restless sea over which the ships are sailing. He sees the springs in the valley, the babbling brook, the mountain torrent and the great rivers, the flowery meadows and the fertile plains. He hears the song-birds in the thicket and observes the scurrying of the conies among the rocks. He hears the lions roar and sees the mighty cedars bending before the storm. He beholds the landscape bathed in the glorious light of the rising sun and wrapped in the mantle of night, the vault of heaven in its diurnal splendor and its nocturnal grandeur. He recounts all these marvels as a traveler, a summer tourist, will enthusiastically relate the impression he has brought back from his vacation trip. Our text is a joyful exclamation which breaks into the narrative. The speaker seems unable to talk long about the works of creation without saying something about the Workman. From the very start he had remembered the God who made all things: he has viewed the created glories of the earth as the garment of the Almighty, who has clothed himself with honor and majesty and challenges man's adoration in the sublime robe of his wonder-working omnipotence and generous goodness. That is the frame of mind in which we should set out on our summer travels. The book of nature is a book full of beautiful lessons. Its every aspect is instructive, elevating, ennobling. But God must give us the eyes of faith to see the wonders of his hand and the skill to spell out the lessons of his wisdom and benevolence from the pages of this Book. The best guide to take along on our travels is not a Baedeker but a Bible. W. H. T. D.

Disbelief and Destiny

SATURDAY, May 26. Isa. 55 : 6. "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found; call ye upon him while he is near." While Aaron Burr was in college, an extensive revival prevailed among the students. He was one of four who refused to be influenced for Christ. He shook off all religious impressions at the turning-point of his career, choosing the downward path of licentiousness, unbelief and infamy. When fourscore years of age, people would point the finger at him on the streets of New York City, saying, "There goes Aaron Burr, the murderer of Hamilton, the betrayer of hearts, the traitor to his country and his God." Burr was a man without a country, without a friend, a moral derelict, floating, drifting aimlessly upon the sea of time.

Think what he might have been if, with his splendid talents, he had taken the path to glory and to God; if he had listened to the Saviour's voice, "Come unto me and I will give you rest."

"Art thou weary, art thou languid, art thou sore distressed?
Come to me, saith One, and coming, be at rest.
If I ask him to receive me, will he say me nay?
Not till earth and not till heaven pass away.
Finding, following, struggling, keeping, is he sure to bless?
Saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs, answer, Yes."

Today is the seeking-time; tomorrow your destiny will be fixed. Eight millions of people will die this year. You may be one of them. What will your soul-harvest be if you continue in the way you are now going? When Jesus knocks, will you again slam the door in his face and say, "When I have a more convenient season, I will call for thee?" The next tick of the clock, you may be in eternity. E. W. C.

Prohibition During the War

WITH the entrance of the United States into the war, the question of nation-wide prohibition has come to the front in a manner that leaves little doubt as to the preferences of the American people. Since the first suggestion was made, only a few weeks ago, that our government adopt prohibition as a war-time measure, the voice of the country has been uttered with a definiteness which shows with what sincere appreciation the proposition is welcomed. Not only a large portion of the religious press and many secular publications, but an amazing number of business and professional organizations have spontaneously approved of prohibition during the war. Health Commissioners and many distinguished physicians at notable gatherings a few days ago declared against the manufacture and importation of alcoholic beverages during the war and for a whole year afterward.

One organization of influential business men, which includes also many who are eminent in professional life, has established itself in New York, with the slogan, "Save 11,000,000 Loaves of Bread a Day!" This represents the amount of grain that is now consumed daily by the brewing interests. Various church temperance organizations, too, are strongly urging prohibition as a war necessity. The President and Congress have been flooded with petitions advocating the passage forthwith of a general prohibitory law, which will save the crops of the country for feeding the nations. We will have grain enough for bread, but not for food and drink, and it would be wisdom to take time by the forelock and conserve the nation's food supply now.

Half of Europe has outlawed the drink traffic during the war, as a measure of necessity. With us, the food situation alone would justify a similar step, especially as it means not only the assurance of a sufficiency for our own needs, but the opportunity to supply the wants of Europe, which will doubtless be larger than we now anticipate.

On moral as well as economic grounds, prohibition is necessary. Nor is it such a radical step as it would seem. Of 2,543 counties in all the states, only 355 are wet today; 22 states and the District of Columbia are wholly dry; five more are nearly so and ripe for full prohibition. In half a year, six states, representing 10,000,000 of population, have joined the dry column.

Whatever tasks lie in the immediate future, let us meet them as a sober nation. It is a time for clear heads and for 100 per cent. efficiency. National prohibition for the duration of the war would assure both. It would, besides, dispose in advance of many troubles that might otherwise rise to vex us afterward.

Blindfolding the People

THE press-muzzling clause of the Espionage bill, now before Congress, is violative of the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States.

That is one good reason—and there are many other good reasons—why it ought to be overwhelmingly defeated.

The First Amendment to the Constitution reads thus:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

Highly as any one may admire President Wilson and the members of our government and esteem their patriotism and judgment, more highly still must any true American admire and esteem those exalted principles of liberty and constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and press, which the Fathers of the Republic gave their best thought to establish and their lives to maintain. These sacred principles and guarantees have been zealously guarded through every generation since the foundation of our nation, and they are our richest heritage as a people. We must not today blindly sacrifice what was so dearly bought and maintained with the Fathers' sufferings and blood.

The people have not forgotten the manifold frauds perpetrated upon our government in the Civil War, nor the embalmed beef scandal of the war with Spain, exposed and corrected by a free press. It is poor protection that is proposed against such and other scandals now, in simple suppression of the truth. If there can be any paradise for big financial looters and munitions bandits, it is here created. If there can be any wide-open gate to unrestrained and incalculable graft, it is in this bill which would suppress facts and silence criticism.

The day of autocracy has gone by. Power in the hands of any man or set of men to conduct the government of a great people, without check or even criticism, is unthinkable today. It is too much power for any man or set of men to hold, anywhere—particularly in a republic.

The blood-bought right of the American people to register their opinion in matters of government is inalienable. It is the stanch foundation of the verity and of the safety of republican government.

Grumbling in the Gloom

IT was a wise old wit who remarked that if talk about our aches and pains were supressed a third of the conversation of civilized life would cease.

If to this interdicted subject were added that of unsatisfactory weather, another third would be chopped off.

Still the females' discourse on the troubles of dress and servants would remain, and chattering would continue.

It is amazing to hear humanity devoting so much of the brief time allotted us here to painfully detailed diagnoses of our headaches, backaches, stomachaches and innumerable other miseries.

The comical part of it lies in the solemn patience with which each listens to another. He or she knows, however, that his or her turn comes next, and the luxury of unloading sickening accounts of sickness will be indulged.

Many of us are not miserable enough with the pains of the present, but must treasure up the pains of the past as a constantly accumulating reservoir, of misery, and borrow them of the future as a debt under which to groan and grumble.

If we would forget it all, and permit others to forget it, throwing open our spiritual side to the boundless blessings offered it, what a universe of joy and cheer and brightness, before unseen, would lie before us!

It is all a matter of mental turn. We may shut the shades of the windows of our minds on the sunny side, and moan in darkness, or we may open the same windows wide, and laugh in the sunlight.

Christianity Not on Trial

THAT Jesus meant that the religious principles he taught were to be regarded as having reference not only to the future life, but were applicable to the times and the people of his day, is made evident in the Gospels. It is all the more strange, therefore, that any large number of nominal Christians should think otherwise.

In these strenuous times in which we ourselves are living, there is a great deal of discussion touching what has been called the "failure of Christianity." Book after book has been published on the subject, and religious and philosophical writers keep up the discussion intermittently. Some blame Christianity for having failed to realize what was expected of it in preserving the social and moral equilibrium of the world; while a few, more observant and seeking deeper for their reasons, go nearer to the real root of the matter, and grasp the great truth that it is not Christianity that has failed, but rather the neglect of it by the world and the church, and that Christianity has never been tried on a scale that would constitute a true historical example.

One of the latest contributors to this view of the discussion is Mr. Robert Goldsmith. In a book issued by the Macmillans, he says: "When the tornado of war struck the tranquil world, it swept away the moral and social teachings of Jesus. At any rate, it did so, as far as their political application was concerned. . . . Of course, if what we mean by the failure of Christianity is that the appeal to Jesus to his own contemporaries, that they substitue a vital for a formal religion—a religion of deed for a religion of creed, a practical religion for a doctrinal—has failed of acceptance by modern society, why then, yes, in that sense, Christianity has failed. The formal Christianity of ritual and dogma has failed, as it was bound to fail." He then points to the fact that some have offered the evidence that religious teachers "have taken our minds off this present world." As long as religion turns men's minds away from the pressing problems of the present and spends its force on dreams of future bliss, he urges, "it will fail to redeem this world from crime and misery, and greed and war. Christianity must come to grips with all the practical problems of this life. . . . Probably now the simplest way out would be for us all to acknowledge, without piling up apologetic words, that the kind of Christianity that has been most commonly practised is impotent to save society. There ought to blow over the church today some pentecostal wind that would stir its dormant energies."

Such is, in substance, the indictment which is brought by many Christian thinkers against the church today. The call for a revival of true Christianity in the church is insistent and it is nowhere emphasized more clearly than in the church herself. This is a sign of promise, for, even though the world and its rulers and peoples have strayed far from the Master's ideal of a Christian civilization, while the spiritual fire still burns within the church, if ever so lightly, there is yet hope of the church girding herself anew to take up her mission victoriously.

She is the one great spiritual influence in the world today. She must now reorganize her lines and concentrate all her energies on the task of winning back the nations to the religion of Jesus, to the true Christianity which cannot fail. The church is now passing through the furnace of trial, but Christ is in the midst of the flame with her, and she will emerge unscathed, purified, unencumbered, and stronger for the struggle.

The Cost of Killing Men

COUNTING the total amounts of money spent and property destroyed and the total number of men killed on all sides, an Ohio editor has estimated that in the present war the average cost of killing a man is $37,000.

Thus, whatever the various issues involved, whatever the outcome, whatever the triumphs or defeats, the gains or losses, the people have to pay $37,000 every time a man is killed.

And for years that $37,000 per man killed will remain as a strangling debt upon the war—shattered peoples, repressing improvement and halting progress.

But the money cost is not the heaviest cost. The money has not passed out of the world, but these lives have. The destroyed property can be restored, but not these men killed.

War has ever cost beyond all proportions to its doubtful gains—this one more than any other—and upon the innocent falls the heaviest burden.

Long after the battle fever shall have cooled, long after the roar of guns is stilled, long after the shell-plowed fields shall have bloomed for many seasons, long after the hate and strife shall have changed to friendship and cooperation,—still the millions who have toiled and suffered that the war might be sustained must yet toil on and suffer under its shackling burden of the dead, the crippled, the widowed, the orphaned and of debt and taxes.

Indeed, it costs heavily to break the commandment:

"Thou shalt not kill."

Thrift

THRIFT is a composite quality. It embraces within itself nearly all of the great virtues. It involves industry, prudence, forethought, self-denial.

It certainly has no relation to niggardliness or meanness.

Some men would let their grandmothers starve for the sake of a few dollars. Such action cannot be called thrifty. A virtue carried to excess becomes a vice and is no longer a virtue.

Thrift that does not take into partnership honesty of character develops into covetousness and avarice.

Thrift is the opposite of thriftlessness, prodigality, improvidence and waste.

Thrift means better homes and better food, more comfort and enjoyment, less waste and less anxiety.

It is possible that a large proportion of people have earnings so small that saving seems impossible. But this is no reason for their being unthrifty. On the contrary, it is reason for making the best and the most of the little they have for their health, comfort and true happiness.

A few dollars in a home, or a savings bank, or any safe investment, is as good seed as ever was sown.

Out of it grow confidence, quickened energies, firmer courage, more stalwart thought and hope, more orderly citizenship, education for the children and the independence and self-respect that lift aimless, hopeless drudges up to the true manhood that aspires and achieves.

The Country Church Problem

A YOUNG minister, successful pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Far Rockaway, New York City, with other friends of influence secured the large fund for the foundation and endowment of the Russell Sage Memorial Church. With his wife of mental and social culture and their beautiful children he moved out of the old church and parsonage into the magnificent new one. Soon after, to the surprise of his friends, he accepted a call to a country church 400 miles away, in western New York. There was not a store nor a street lamp, and there were only a few houses far apart. It was country, sure enough! The church there was nearly a hundred years old, but a spot was about all there was left of the institution. The old building was in poor repair; there was no congregation, no minister and no funds. There were in that singularly rural neighborhood the seeds of a beautiful Christian civilization, people who said, "The best preacher is none too good for us," and began to look for a man who could fill any pulpit to be their minister. And the call of the country church to the city preacher was not more hearty and divine than was the response of the city pastor to the country call. That was five years ago. An ambitious church monthly has a report by W. D. Young, which is so wonderful that it sounds like a fairy tale. We give a few of the more important facts. A Planters' Club was formed. The old manse property and barn were secured. The Planters' Club raised $800 to repair the barn. A clubhouse was built. The annual fair cleared $500. The Good Roads movement was organized. The religious features of the society were strictly maintained. The city people, the country people, and employees on the farms for the first time had an affectionate community life. A fire burned up the church, the center of all. In one day $7,000 was raised for a new one, and in a year's time it was dedicated. The church has a community library of 800 volumes. The women have their Aid Societies, the day schools and Sunday school flourish, and property in the zone of the church in five years has doubled in value, in a period when real estate values have shrunken nearly everywhere. The church paper announced two weeks of evangelistic services, and also one of the pastor's courageous blasts against the saloon. We suspect it would be hard to get the pastor back into the great city again from the sweet, pure country church with its lofty mental, social, moral and spiritual ideals and achievements. The report recognizes the work of God in the church in the wonderful transformation, and reflects the divine assistance thus expressed: "Then Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." (I Sam. 7 : 12.)

Kenilworth Castle for Sale

KENILWORTH, which is now the most stately ruined castle in England, is to be offered for sale at auction by its present owner, the Earl of Clarendon. The castle and the 8,000 acres of land that belong to it are put up at auction for what they will bring because the war tax is so high and is going higher. Kenilworth has had a notable history in itself, and has been immortalized in literature by Sir Walter Scott in his "Kenilworth." The best authority places the foundation of the castle about the year 1120 by Geoffrey de Clinton. It was defended in 1265 by Simon de Montfort's son, and passed by marriage in 1359 to John of Gaunt, and to his son, Henry IV. It remained a crown possession till 1563, when Elizabeth conferred it on Leicester. In "Kenilworth," Scott describes the entertainment of Elizabeth by Leicester at the castle, how he had a bridge built over the lake so she might enter the castle by a path never used before, and how $5,000 a day for eighteen days were spent in the entertainment of the royal guest. He told of its part in the Barons' wars in holding out against Henry III, and of the revelries of Mortimer, Earl of March, while his dethroned sovereign, Edward II, languished in its dungeons. Scott, after describing the magnificence of the groups of buildings amid the thousands of acres, the lakes, deer parks, grand forests and all, thus wisely moralizes: "We cannot but add that of the lordly palace, where princes feasted and heroes fought, now in the blood earnest of storm siege and now in games of chivalry, where beauty dealt the prize which valor won, all is now desolate. The massive ruins of the castle only serve to show what their splendor once was, and to impress upon the musing visitor the transitory valor of human possessions and the happiness of those who enjoy a humble lot in virtuous contentment." If Scott were living today, he would add to this paragraph that the ruined castle is the type of the haughtiness, the wicked extravagance, the cruel oppressions of the king business among the best of nations, and to the emptiness and mockery of its displays of stateliness and magnificence as a means of securing respect for or obedience to royal authority. The people of the world are coming into their own, and kings' houses, and quarrels, and despotisms are to be thrown by them into the ruins. This is the prinicple of the Christian democracy that is to become universal: freedom by a knowledge of the truth for the individual and nation. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." (John 8 : 32.)

House of Costly Quartz

PERHAPS the only house of its kind in the world is the one at Lovers' Roost, near Butte, Montana, made of quartz containing gold, silver, copper, zinc and other metals worth twice as much as a house made of ordinary stone material. The house, the home is a type of the body, the residence of the soul. However beautiful or valuable may be the earthly house in which we live, the Christian has the promise that in the other world he shall have one more magnificent: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." (II Cor. 5 : 1.)

Two Mules Bring $5,000

THE high cost of the American mule caused by the shipment of so many thousands of them to the war is indicated by the fact that a farmer at Scarsdale, N. Y., recently paid $5,000 for a pair of trotting pinto mules, said to be the record price for these animals. The parent of the breed is the pinto Indian pony of the rich Comanche tribe of Oklahoma, which has turned its attention to the profitable business of raising pinto mules. The pair at Hartsdale are genuine calico, with rich bay and creamy white patches. They have trotted their mile in three minutes. The mule is an ancient as well as a stubborn institution. His endurance and efficiency were appreciated by the Hebrews. The prophet makes this reference to the mule market at the fair: "They of the house of Togarmath traded in thy fairs with horses and horsemen and mules." (Ezek. 27 : 14.)

Caught Fish Worth $152

A CREW of fishermen about a mile from the harbor of Port Bruce, Ontario, on Lake Erie, made a fine catch of fish the other day, which netted them $152. And the catch consisted of but one fish, a huge sturgeon which measured 7 feet 6 inches and weighted 249 pounds. The meat dressed sold for $42, and the caviar for $110, making the $152. Fishing was an important industry in Palestine, and fishermen were a hardy, sterling class. From them Christ drew largely in founding his church. To two fishermen, Peter and Andrew, whom he saw casting a net into the sea, he said: "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." (Matt. 4 : 19.)

Veteran Journalist's Birthday

RECENTLY John Merry Le Sage, for nearly fifty years managing editor of the London Daily Telegraph, celebrated his eightieth birthday by turning up bright and early at his editorial desk for a busy day's work. What a beautiful and appropriate thing for him to do! What a splendid specimen of a veteran journalist! Le Sage is a great believer in anonymous editorial work, and though his name has not been generally known to the public, his influence in Fleet Street and throughout the nation has been very great. Much of the hardest and best work mentally and morally has been done by the modest, silent editors, of whom it can be appropriately said, "Ye are the light of the world." (Matt. 5 : 14.)

New Hampshire a Dry State

ON April 17 the governor of New Hampshire signed the bill passed by the legislature abolishing saloons and breweries, which law will go into effect May 1, 1918, when 600 saloons and four breweries will go out of business. This makes twenty-six dry states, or two more than a majority of all the states of the Union, and within ten of the three-fourths necessary to ratify a national prohibition amendment, when Congress shall see fit to pass one. From 1855 to 1903 New Hampshire was under state prohibition, but in 1903 the local option law was passed, giving each town the right to vote on the question. The state by its action has heeded this injunction: "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." (Phil. 4 : 8.)

Sharkskins for Shoes

THE high price of leather has brought into market substitutes for hides of animals that have hair. Ten thousand sharkskins were brought from Cuba and sold in New York the other day as a substitute for leather in the manufacture of cheap shoes. The high price of shoes and the low price of men is thus referred to by the prophet: "Thus saith the Lord: For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes." (Amos 2 : 6.)

Billy Sunday on Social Sins

A Sermon Preached in the Big Tabernacle in New York*

TEXT—Jer. 5 : 25. "Your iniquities have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you."

IN other words, God said, I want you to do this, but you wanted to sin and not do right. In this verse Jeremiah is giving an explanation of the things of his day. He came as a prophet of God to the people of God. God had promised them many things, but they did not obey him and did not get the benefits of the promise. When God enters into a covenant he promises sustenance, peace, joy, prosperity, victory, honor. Such are a few of the numberless promises given to the Jews. But they were rejected by the people and they did not gain the benefits. The same is true to-day.

God's promises to the man who accepts are numberless. Any man, unless he is a fool, would rather have God's love than God's curse. Any man, unless he is a fool, would rather go to heaven than go to hell.

But they were not possessed of these things and therefore the blessings were a failure; peace turned to war, joy turned to gloom, prosperity to need, victory to loss and honor to dishonor. All were failures. Why? Did God make promises, knowing he could not fulfil them? No! Jeremiah laid the blame where it belonged, on the people. "Your iniquities have turned away these things and your sins have withholden good things from you."

God said: "My promises were conditional. If you do my commandments you will be possessed of the fulfilments of these promises." But they didn't do it and a curse came. It was not unfaithfulness on God's part. This is true of the people here today. We are under a dispensation of salvation, free, full, perfect and eternal to all who believe. It is offered to you, whoever you may be or wherever you may be.

If you want to know why it doesn't rain when you want rain, it's because you are too devilish. If you want to know why blessings don't fall upon you, it's because your iniquities have turned them away. Maybe you don't like my saying this. If you are decent and like to see everything decent you will like my preaching. If you are not decent you won't like it. So that's your number.

We are sent out to speak to the generation in which we live. We have numberless things promised to us today. For example: "He that believeth in me shall have everlasting life."

WE are promised joy and peace if we believe. We are promised emancipation from sin. We are promised victory. We are promised provision for every need, according to his riches. Not all our wants, understand, but all our needs. If I supplied your needs with my riches you wouldn't have near as much as if some millionaire would supply your needs, but God can make a millionaire look like a plugged counterfeit cent. All belongs to Jesus. He says, "The cattle on the field are mine."

But some of us want things we don't need. I want a limousine, but I don't need it. The committee will give me the use of it any time I want it. If some of these rich ducks attempted to supply your needs you could get lots of things, but you couldn't get anything like the wonderful gifts that God hands out. So let's try to be millionaires in grace, not hoboes panhandling at God's door.

In other words, there is nothing for you outside of Jesus Christ. All comes through Jesus. Such are a few of the numberless promises which will fill the life of the believer full of hope. To us as believers they should be desired and should be things greatly longed for. But are they possessed? There are thousands of church members that are utter strangers to the highest religious experiences. They don't know the A, B, C of religion. They have no assurance of salvation, no assurance of peace, no experience of God's power to keep them safe through temptation.

Why are they without peace and rest? I'll tell you: it's on account of the conditions of the people in the church. If church members will quit playing cards we'll have no more gamblers. When the church members quit patronizing theaters they'll either clean up or go out of business. When the church members quit voting for the saloon the saloon will go to hell. I don't believe there is an evil in the world to-day the church of God can't drive out. If you can't believe yourself, I'll shoot the truth into your old carcass. I'll never compromise. If the day ever comes when I have no compromise I'll leave the pulpit and never return. Never will I lower God's standard.

You should be happy and glad instead of standing and yelling, "Oh, wretched man that I am!" Why is it that the Christian life is pictured as sad? Is the Christian life something that we must struggle for and never reach? Did God put the standard too high for human attainment? Was God's promise never meant to be fulfilled? Is God trifling with the people? No. The trouble is with the people, not with God. "Your iniquities have turned away these things and your sins have withholden good things from you." Jeremiah knew where the blame belonged.

ALL that was the matter in Jeremiah's day is true today. Why don't you accept? What is it in your life that hinders you from being blessed? Is it something in your life, an impure thought, bad books, lying, cheating, stealing, bad companions?

One reason why people have such low moral standards is this damnable novel-reading. One of the curses of the country today is novels. All of the authors have different ideas of religion and not one of them has the right idea. No matter what the book, a woman will gulp it down and the Bible will lie on the centertable, unopened.

God Almighty set the standard where he wanted it to be, and where he knew that we could reach it. The standard of Christianity is not too high for any man, I don't care who he is.

Some of you church people say that you don't like my preaching—it's too frank. Well, some of you had better be preached to in that way than slide into hell right out of your pews or out of the choir loft.

If you want to live in sin, all right, live in sin, and go to hell at the end. But you can't live in sin and go to heaven, too.

Are some of you any better than the painted women of the red light district, who slide in here and hear a little and then slide out again?

Is there something in your life, selfishness, pride, criticising God, knocking the preacher? I will treat with respect any Jew or Gentile, negro or white man, any one, but I will not associate with a non-Christian. In other words, I will have nothing to do with a man who sneers at my God and sneers at my Christ. The Bible tells me to do this.

I'll tell you why you don't let him in. It's because of some of your associations, lodge, family, or financial reasons, someone you're afraid you will displease. There's many a man married into a family and when you run up against one sinner in that bunch and hit him the whole gang will jingle like a bunch of sleighbells. Is it envy?

Envy is one of the biggest robbers in the world today. It's hard to see someone with a big flashing stud, or an auto, and not want them. Envy. When you see Persian rugs on your neighbor's floor and yours covered with rag carpets. Envy! When hers is a sealskin coat and yours is near-seal. Envy! So I say envy is one of the biggest robbers in the world today.

The trouble is, you conform to the world. Come out from among them. That doesn't mean come out from the church and leave the church. Some church members think it does, so they come out and say that the church is not good enough for them. They've got to show me. I'm from Missouri. It means come out from the world and not from the church. The Universalists base all their faith in these two verses, "And you shall call his name Jesus, for he shall save the people from their sins." Notice that says "from their sins," not in their sins. And "As in Adam all men shall die, so in Christ all men shall be made alive." That doesn't say they shall all be saved. They shall all be made alive. And they wrest the Scripture to their own destruction.

I WISH every one could be saved, but every one will not. If you repent you will be saved. If you don't repent you'll go to hell. Sin in the church cancels the blessing. Sin pursued makes promises null and void. The same was true of the Jews of old and the same is true of us today. The blessings will become curses. It may not be that you do what God tells you not to do, but you may not do what God tells you to do. Your sin may not be the sin of commission, but the sin of omission.

"Thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not commit adultery." These are easy to understand. These are the ones you shall not do. But the law of God tells you to do this also: "Love the Lord thy God with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself." Ah. That's the trouble. You're not doing what God tells you to do. There is no difference in doing what God tells you not to do and in not doing what God tells you to do. That knocks the underpinning out from under a bunch of you.

I'll lay this before you. You say: "I don't steal. I don't lie. I never murdered." All right. Do you love the the Lord your God above all things? And your neighbor as yourself? Do you hate anybody? Now you're up against it. You refuse to apologize. You've had a fuss and you won't make it up.

Maybe you don't pay your debts. Maybe you neglect your Bible. Maybe you are stingy to the church of God. Maybe you're a coward when it comes to giving testimony, and a preacher doesn't hear your voice in prayer meeting from year to year.

THERE are just seven Biblical definitions of sin. If you can find any more, trot 'em out. There's lots of descriptions of sin, but only seven definitions. What is sin? First, "Sin is a transgression of the law", that's the common definition whenever you ask the question; second, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin"; third, "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin"; fourth, "If you have respect of person, ye commit sin." That gets a bunch of you, that gets you preachers, you men and women. In other words, it means to show favoritism. Fifth, "Thought of foolishness is sin"; sixth, "A high look, a proud heart, sins"; seventh, "All unrighteousness is sin."

Look at the lot of stuff they label religion nowadays; it isn't of Jesus Christ but of the devil. It's a lot of hodgepodge, helter-skelter, flap-flap that is so close to hell that God wouldn't recognize it if you succeeded in bringing it to his attention.

Trot out some one who doesn't stand convicted before one of these. Now, what are you going to do?

First, confess your sin. Lay hold on this that the Spirit reveals to you wrong in your life, be more pliable to the hands of the Spirit. The trouble with the church of God today is a lot of you stand convicted of your sins, but you won't throw them out. Name it. Say, "God, I've been worldly. I've been proud. I've neglected your gifts. I've sat in judgment on your servants."

A man must not only confess, but he must reform. It is of no use to confess and keep on living like the devil.

Admit that you've got a miserable, grouchy disposition. We don't have to answer to God for others' sins. I don't say I'm perfect, but when I'm through and we're in heaven, God won't ask you whether you were like me or not, or whether I was like you or not. Every man shall give answer for himself. Confess. Be humble and receive a blessing. Second, renounce your sin, get rid of it, throw it out. Confession without renunciation doesn't amount to a snap of the fingers.

There is one thing I want you all to understand and that is that I have no use for the book or the magazine that doesn't treat Jesus or the Gospel as they should be treated. I'm willing to bet that there are a lot of you who, if you went home and burned a lot of books and magazines that are lying around your house, you wouldn't have enough paper left to stop up the barrel of a shotgun.

SOLOMON said, "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper, but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall find mercy."

You shall say: "God, I won't read that literary trash." You may call me narrow, but I've made up my mind never to read any book that sneers at Jesus Christ.

Say, "God, I won't go with that crowd."

The man or woman in earnest will begin by taking the Spirit into his or her life. You'll tell God your troubles. Not the public. It's none of the public's business. You don't have to tell the public your sins, for it's none of the public's business.

You say you can receive him in private, live better lives, but God says you must confess him openly.

Third, do what God tells you to do. Not only not do what he tells you not to do, but do what he tells you to do. These are the two pillars that support the Gospel.

Say, "Lord, I will write that letter of apology; I will ask pardon; I will give to the church; I will have family prayer; I will do what you say."

Fourth and last, give yourself up wholly, freely, mind, soul, personality, influence, irrevocably to God. Lay yourself on the altar and take your hands off. You have been bought with a price. You belong to him.

This is my coat. I can take a pair of scissors and cut it up if I want to. It belongs to me. I can take this watch and throw it away and smash it up if I want to. It belongs to me. I belong to God and he has a right to do what he pleases with me, and also with you. Lay all of your sins at the foot of the cross and say: "Nothing in my hand I bring; simply to thy cross I cling"; and hear him say, "Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee; go in peace and sin no more."

Tell God you're beat. Say the devil is too much for you; tell him that you have been negligent, criticising the church, blaspheming, cursing, committing adultery, and tell him you don't want to do these things. Then he'll take away all the alloy. What is alloy? See this watch; it isn't pure gold; it's 18-karat gold. One per cent. is copper. Pure gold would wear away by friction with your hands. A friend of mine out in Iowa had $40,000 in gold and he took it to the bank, but they wouldn't take it at face value, and they weighed it and it had lost $1,500 by wear. So alloy is to prevent the gold wearing away.

God will take away from you all in your life that makes you do what he says not to do and won't let you do what he tells you to do, and he'll put into your life that which will make you do what he tells you to do and keep you from doing that which he tells you not to do.

*In delivering this sermon, which was furnished to the Christian Herald by Robert Matthews, secretary to Mr. Sunday, the evangelist introduced a number of variations, suited to his audience and conditions at the moment.

See what the Gospel does.

Why do I want to pray? Because of the Spirit of God. Why does that man cuss? He's filled with the devil. Here is a man who is a booze fighter; he hits the booze. Sure. He is of the devil; but receive God and he will give you the power to resist all of these things.

Receive the Spirit of God. Let the church do this and then will be fulfilled what is said in Mal. 3 : 10: "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse." The church is stingy.

Under the oldtime Mosaic law the Jews were ordered to give one-tenth to the Lord, and that's what you ought to do today. "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove to me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

How can any sane man or woman refuse to receive such a blessing as this? How can he push it away? And you will receive this blessing if you believe, and if you don't God says it were better for you if you had never been born or that you take a millstone and tie it around your neck and cast yourself into the sea.

Now you must know what was meant when Jeremiah said they kept on in the things they knew they should not, and Jeremiah said, "Your iniquities have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you."

Recruiting for Christ

IN the first four weeks of the Sunday campaign, the first ten days of which were given only to preparation with no call for decisions, 16,034 persons out of those who had hit the trail signed cards declaring their purpose either to serve Christ or to consecrate their lives fully to him.

Sunday, May 6, the first day of the fifth week, 2,911 persons hit the trail, 499 at the morning service, 1,032 in the afternoon service, 1,091 in the evening service at the tabernacle, while 289 went forward at the women's big meeting at the Hippodrome led by Mrs. Sunday, on Sunday afternoon. The afternoon and evening sermon on May 6 was entitled "The Devil's Boomerang Up to Date," or "Hot Cakes Off the Griddle." It was well named. Mr. Sunday in clean, straightforward language, which every man could understand, tore away all the draperies of convention and misconception from sins of impurity and held them before his audience of men in all their nakedness, and with all of their inevitable and terrible results.

The sermon was evidently a revelation to many of the hearers, and that it carried conviction to the hearts of men was evidenced by the spiritual temperature of the tabernacle long before the call for trail-hitters was given. Billy had his audience with him, some of them gasping. Two men fainted in the afternoon, four at night.

The sin of drunkenness did not escape, and after a philippic against the liquor traffic, the most intense of many direct assaults which he has made, Mr. Sunday jumped on his chair and pulpit and declared that if when the campaign was over they should take him on a ferryboat and dump him overboard into the Hudson River with a stone around his neck, every man in New York could say, "There goes a man that wasn't afraid to preach the truth." The audience of thousands of men did not give Mr. Sunday a chance to continue for several minutes, but leaped to its feet as one man, handkerchiefs came out, and cheer after cheer resounded through the tabernacle, a great spontaneous tribute of men to a man.

When the cheering had subsided Mr. Sunday said, "I have just made a few remarks on the business. I will preach on it next week." He then announced that on Sunday, May 13, he would preach his great "booze" sermon to men in the afternoon.

A Message from "Ma" Sunday

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE Sunday home, at 184 Northern Avenue, Manhattan, is a low, rambling, uncitified-looking house of tan stucco and dark-brown wood. It is comfortable-looking, cozy-looking, and above all it is a friendly-looking house. As I went through the opening in the high dull-red brick wall and walked slowly down the red-brick path, I saw newly budding trees and broad green lawns, and, smiling from every corner, the gold of daffodil flowers. Somehow the very house seemed to have absorbed a bit of the warm personality that it sheltered.

The door swung open in answer to my ring, and a pleasant young man took my name. I might have been a frequent visitor there, the informality was so delightful. I was shown to a cushioned seat near a window that seemed fairly on top of the blue Hudson, and the young man left me.

There were other people in the room, which was a broad, cheery yellow-and-bronze-and-brown one. In two corners men conversed in low tones; another man sat reading in an easy chair by a window, and a small boy with a wide and appealing smile played tiddle-dy-winks with a tall man who let him win every other game. I felt myself suddenly a part of the room—a part of the cheer and absorption and happiness. I smiled at the top of the small boy's head as he bent with interest over his game.

"MRS. SUNDAY will see you upstairs!" It was the pleasant young man who spoke. "If you'll come this way——"

I went upstairs. Somewhere above me I heard the familiar click of a typewriter—two typewriters. And then, in the wide doorway of a sunny bedroom, I saw Mrs. Sunday.

I understood when I saw her standing there why folk call her "Ma" Sunday. She isn't only the great helper and wife of an evangelist as she looks at you and smiles; she's more than that, for she's a woman with the motherlight in her eyes, a real woman waiting to welcome one into her home and her heart.

"Papa," said Mrs. Sunday by way of greeting, "is pounding out a sermon. So perhaps you'll come into this little back room with me?"

We went through the bedroom on mousy-quiet feet. Mr. Billy Sunday, rather impressive in a blue velvet dressing-gown, sat at a desk, writing. His face was interested, alert. He never heard us.

I followed Mrs. Sunday to a small room, just off the bedroom. A sort of den it was, with a desk and a divan and a couple of easy-chairs. Mrs. Sunday sat down on the divan and motioned me to a seat beside her.

"You must," said Mrs. Sunday, "pardon the way I'm dressed. I put on a house-gown this morning because I wanted to rub out some clothes in the tubs——" She smiled.

I smiled too. "I wonder," I said before I thought, "if the people who haven't seen you guess how real you are?"

"I can't help being real," laughed Mrs. Sunday. "I've had to be, because I've lived in all sorts of places."

"I've often wondered," I ventured, "if you came from the country."

"I was born in the country," answered Mrs. Sunday, "but our family moved away to Chicago when I was very small. I've spent most of my summers in the country, but city life is a trifle more familiar to me. I like,' she continued with a smile, "your city, New York, as well as any that I've ever worked in. The people are so big, even in their criticisms. . . . But"—and Mrs. Sunday looked at me inquiringly—"you wanted to see me about something, didn't you—something in particular?"

"I wanted, most of all," I told her, "to get some sort of a message from you to my girls. I wanted to ask you for a word of advice that I might pass on to them."

Mrs. Sunday looked off into the distance. Her kindly face was very serious.

"It says," she said finally, "in Daniel, 'He who saves souls is wise.' Every girl should be a wise girl.

"Some girls have more opportunities to save souls than other girls. The girls living in crowded cities, for instance, are able to do more good than the girls living in isolated farming districts. But it isn't the girl who does the most who is the wise girl in God's sight. It's the girl who does the most in proportion to her opportunities.

"God gives us opportunities. But we must make the best of each opportunity that he gives us. God is like a business man. He'll give opportunities for advancement as long as the girl he gives them to does her best.

"No employer will raise the salary of a girl who doesn't try to earn what she's getting already. That would be bad business. It wouldn't even help the girl. God is not going to keep on giving you opportunities if you don't make the best of the ones that you have."

Mrs. Sunday paused for a moment. And then,

"Some girls," she said, "doubt that they are real Christians because they have never experienced any blinding flash of conversion. But I think—I know—that any girl who believes in Christ and confesses her belief is a real Christian. Some people are born believing; they don't need any light, because they already have it.

"But lots of people think that, because they believe, it isn't necessary to confess their belief. 'I love God, that's enough,' they say. 'Why should I confess it?' But it isn't enough. It's just as wrong to believe in God and not confess as it is to confess faith when you haven't any belief!

"When you're a real Christian, nobody has to tell you—you're sure! It fills your heart and soul with light and joy and hope. It makes every deed worth doing, every word worth saying, every thought worth thinking. Religion isn't a matter of form—a person can follow all the religious forms in the world and still go to hell. Religion, Christianity, is a matter of being and living and making the most of your opportunity."

MRS. SUNDAY paused again and glanced down. There beside us, on the divan, fluttered a small white note. She picked it up—read it. And then she laughed the whole-souled, joy-filled laugh that I had heard before.

"It's from our chambermaid," she said. "This morning I found her blubbering in the hall and heard her saying cross things to one of the other maids, 'Mary,' I told her, 'don't you know that what you say doesn't hurt anyone but yourself? Cross words and unkind thoughts wound your own soul.' This is what she's written," Mrs. Sunday referred to the small white letter.

"'Please,'" she read, "'I didn't mean to be cross. I won't again. And I'd do anything in this world for you, Mrs. Sunday.'"

QUITE suddenly came a voice from the bedroom—a ringing voice that has made many thousand men and women "hit the trail."

"Oh, mamma," called the voice; "can you come—"

"I must look up a reference for him," murmured Mrs. Sunday. "I mustn't keep him waiting. Seems"—she laughed half-ruefully—"as if there's so much to do. I wonder if I'll ever get those clothes washed."

This is a picture of Mrs. Sunday—who is called affectionately, by a nation, "Ma" Sunday. A preacher she is, herself, a good mother; a splendid housekeeper and, above all, a woman who has kept her simplicity and her real common touch so that her servants adore her, and the women of the United States, though they know her only from a distance, look to her for advice.

Concrete Roads are used widely in Connecticut, like this one leading out of South Norwalk. Built in 1914 under the direction of G. A. Sherron, Engineer.

How Concrete Roads Save Gasoline

EVERY motorist has observed how his car accelerates when he goes from an unimproved road to a stretch of concrete; but he may not realize how large a saving of power and gasoline that acceleration represents. If he were to travel over a hard even surface habitually instead of over the average country road, his gasoline bill would be greatly reduced. A motorist in Mississippi has figured out that concrete roads in his community save him $30 per year in the gasoline consumed by a single car.

Reduce All Items of Operating Cost

Concrete roads lessen all other items of operating expense. The strain on tires is immeasurably reduced. On the hard, gritty surface they can grip better and do not skid. There are no loose stones to bruise the fabric.

The car rides smoothly without lunging and plunging over mud holes and ruts. The chassis lasts much longer and keeps in better repair. The engine has a smooth, even pull.

The frame, springs and transmission suffer none of the racking due to rough roads. The car depreciates much more slowly and costs less for repairs and renewals.

Any permanent road is a boon to motoring, but concrete is particularly desirable from the standpoint of easy traction, of safe, comfortable riding, and of road visibility after dark.

Concrete also has the solidity and strength which endure under heavy traffic and make it so universally used in the most important engineering works.

Alternate stretches of improved roads and mud holes do not get the motorist anywhere. He needs a continuous highway just as a locomotive needs a continuous track. Systems of concrete highways are the efficient and economical plan.

This Association can give you some interesting figures to show how light is the annual tax levy to pay off a good roads bond issue. Our Bulletin No. 136 has some interesting facts about concrete roads. We will be glad to send it to you.

CONCRETE FOR PERMANENCE

The Road to Understanding

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, orphan daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement, and a month later a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once his father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first two months of the honeymoon were spent in finding a home and trying to live in a flat on $15 a week. This problem was soon solved to Helen's satisfaction by means of an account at the grocery, which she opened without Burke's knowledge. The explosion came with the first batch of grocer's bills. Burke then instructed Helen in the mysteries of bookkeeping, and at the same time tried to polish the manners of his rustic wife. One evening Burke received a visit from his friend Dr. Gleason, a traveler and archeologist, and Helen did her best to entertain their guest; but her efforts only served to mortify her husband and accentuate the gulf that separated her from the refined society in which he had been reared. Helen returned all the calls she had received from Burke's friends, but the calls were not repeated. After that Helen soon ceased to be the daintily gowned wife and Burke had ceased to care. One day Burke announced that his father was sick and had sent for him, and he started joyfully to revisit the old home, in spite of Helen's protests.

CHAPTER III—Continued

OUTSIDE the house Burke drew a long breath, and yet a longer one. It seemed as if he could not inhale deeply enough the crisp, bracing air. Then, with an eager stride that would cover the distance in little more than half the usual time, he set off toward Elm Hill. There was only joyous anticipation in his face now. The worry was all gone. After all, had not Brett said that this illness of dad's was nothing serious?

For a week Burke had known that something was wrong—that his father was not at the Works. In vain had he haunted office doors and corridors for a glimpse of a face that never appeared. Then had come the news that John Denby was ill. A paralyzing fear clutched the son's heart.

Was this to be the end, then? Was dad to—die, and never to know, never to read his boy's heart? Was this the end of all hopes of some day seeing the old look of love and pride in his father's eyes? Then it would, indeed, be the end of—everything, if dad died; for what was the use of struggling, of straining every nerve to make good, if dad was not to be there to—know?

It had been at this point that Burke, in spite of his hurt pride, and of his very lively doubts as to the cordiality of his reception, had almost determined to go himself to the old home and demand to see his father. Then, just in time, had come Brett's wonderful message that his father wished to see him, and that he was not, after all, fatally or even seriously ill.

Dad was not going to die, then; and dad wished to see him—wished to see him!

Burke drew in his breath now again, and bounded up the great stone steps of Denby Mansion, two at a time. The next minute, for the first time since his marriage the summer before, he stood in the wide, familiar hallway.

Benton, the old butler, took his hat and coat; and the way he took them had in it all the flattering deference of the well-trained servant, and the rapturous joy of the head of a house welcoming a dear wanderer home.

Burke looked into the beaming old face and shining eyes—and swallowed hard before he could utter an unsteady "How are you, Benton?"

"I'm very well sir, thank you, sir. And it's glad I am to see you, Master Burke. This way, please. The master's in the library, sir."

Unconsciously Burke Denby lifted his chin. A long-lost something seemed to have come back to him. He could not himself have defined it; and he certainly could not have told why, at that moment, he should suddenly have thought of the supercilious face of his hated "boss" at the Works.

Behind Benton's noiseless steps, Burke's feet sank into luxurious velvet depths. His eyes swept from one dear familiar object to another, in the great, softly lighted hall, and leaped ahead to the open door of the library. Then, somehow, he found himself face to face with his father in the dear, well-remembered room.

"Well, Burke, my boy, how are you?"

They were the same words that had been spoken months before in the president's office at the Denby Iron Works, and they were spoken by the same voice. They were spoken to the accompaniment of an outstretched hand, too, in each case. But, to Burke, who had heard them on both occasions, they were as different as darkness and daylight. He could not have defined it, even to himself; but he knew, the minute he grasped the outstretched hand and looked into his father's eyes, that the hated, impenetrable, insurmountable "wall" was gone. Yet there was nothing said, nothing done, except a conventional "Just a little matter of business, Burke, that I wanted to talk over with you," from the elder man; and an equally conventional "Yes, sir," from his son.

Then the two sat down. But, for Burke, the whole world had burst suddenly into song.

It was, indeed, a simple matter of business. It was not even an important one. Ordinarily it would have been Brett's place, or even one of his assistants', to speak of it. But the President of the Denby Iron Works took it up point by point, and dwelt lovingly on each detail. And Burke, his heart one wild pæan of rejoicing, sat with a grave countenance, listening attentively.

And when there was left not one small detail upon which to pin another word, and when Burke was beginning to dread the moment of dismissal, John Denby turned, as if casually, to a small clay tablet on the desk near him. And Burke, following his father into a five-thousand-year-old past to decipher a Babylonian thumb-print, lost all fear of that dread dismissal.

Later came old Benton with the ale and the little cakes that Burke had always loved. With a pressure of his thumb, then, John Denby switched off half the lights, and the two, father and son, sat down before the big fireplace.

Behind the century-old andirons the fire leaped and crackled, throwing weird shadows over the beamed ceiling, the book-lined walls, the cabinets of curios, bringing out here and there a bit of gold tooling behind a glass door or a glinting flash from bronze or porcelain. With a body at ease and a mind at rest, Burke leaned back in his chair with a long-drawn sigh, each tingling sense ecstatically responsive to every charm of light and shade and luxury.

Half an hour later he rose to go. John Denby, too, rose to his feet.

"You'll come again, of course," the father said, as he held out his hand. For the first time that evening there was a faint touch of constraint in his manner. "Suppose you come to dinner—Sunday. Will you?"

"Surely I will, and be glad—" With a swift surge of embarrassed color Burke Denby stopped short. In one shamed, shocked instant it had come to him that he had forgotten Helen—forgotten her! Not for a long hour had he even remembered that there was such a person in existence. "Er—ah—that is," he began again, stammeringly.

An odd expression crossed John Denby's countenance.

"You will, of course, bring your wife," he said. "Good-night."

Burke mumbled an incoherent something and fled. The next moment he found himself in the hall with Benton, deferential and solicitous, holding his coat.

Again out in the crisp night air, Burke drew a long breath. Was it true? Had dad invited him to dinner next Sunday? And with Helen? What had happened? Had dad's heart got the better of his pride? Had he decided that quarreling did not pay? Did this mean the beginning of the end? Was he ready to take his son back into his heart? He had not said anything, really. He had just talked in the usual way, as if nothing had happened. But that would be like dad. Dad hated scenes. Dad would never say: "I'm sorry I was so harsh with you; come back—you and Helen. I want you!"—and then fall to crying and kissing like a woman. Dad would never do that.

It would be like dad just to pick up the thread of the old comradeship exactly where he had dropped it months ago. And that was what he had seemed to be doing that evening. He had talked just as he used to talk—except that never once had he mentioned—mother. Burke remembered this now, and wondered at it. It was so unusual—in dad. Had he done it purposely? Was there a hidden meaning back of it? He himself had not liked to think of mother, lately; yet, somehow, she seemed always to be in his mind. In spite of himself he was always wondering what she would think of—Helen. But surely, dad——

With his thoughts in a dizzy whirl of excitement and questionings, Burke thrust his key into the lock and let himself into his own apartment.

The hall—never had it looked so hopelessly cheap and small. Burke, still under the spell of Benton's solicitous ministrations, jerked off his hat and coat and hung them up. Then he strode into the living-room.

Helen fully dressed, was sitting at the table, reading a magazine.

"Hullo! Sitting up, are you, chicken?" he greeted her, brushing her cheek with his lips. "I told you not to; but maybe it's just as well you did—I might have waked you," he laughed boyishly. "Guess what's happened!"

"Got a raise?" Helen's voice was eager.

Her husband frowned.

"No. I got one last month, you know. I'm getting a hundred now. What more can you expect—in my position?" He spoke coldly, with a tinge of sharpness. He was wondering why Helen always managed to take the zest out of anything he was going to do or say. Then, with an obvious effort at gayety, he went on: "It's better than a raise, chicken. Dad's invited us to dinner next Sunday—both of us."

"To dinner! Only to dinner?"

"Only to dinner! Why, Helen—only to dinner!"

"Well, I can't help it, Burke. It just makes me mad to see you jump and run and be so pleased over just a dinner, when it ought to be for every dinner and all the time; and you know it."

"But, Helen, it isn't the dinner. It's that—that dad cares." The man's voice softened, and became not quite steady. "That maybe he's forgiven me. That he's going to be now the—the old dad that I used to know. Oh, Helen, I've missed him so! I've——"

But his wife interrupted tartly.

"Well, I should think 'twas time he did forgive you—and I'm not saying I think there was anything to forgive, either. There wouldn't have been, if he hadn't tried to interfere with what was our own business—yours and mine."

There was a brief silence. Burke, looking very white and stern, had got to his feet, and was moving restlessly about the room.

"Did you think he was—giving in?" asked Helen at last.

"He was very kind."

"What did you tell him?"

"What do you mean?"

"About the dinner, Sunday."

"I don't know, exactly. I said—something; yes, I think. I meant it for yes—then." The man spoke with sudden utter weariness.

There was another brief silence. A dawning shrewdness was coming into Helen's eyes.

"Oh, of course, yes. We'd want to go," she murmured. "It might mean he was giving in, couldn't it?"

There was no reply.

"Do you think he was giving in?"

Still no reply.

Helen scowled.

"Burke, why in the world don't you answer me?" she demanded crossly. "You were talkative enough a minute ago, when you came in. I should think you might have enough thought of my interests to want us to go to live with your father, if there's any chance of it. And while 'twouldn't be my way to jump the minute he held out his hand, yet if this dinner really means that we'll be going up there to live pretty soon, why——"

"Helen!" Burke had winced visibly, as if from a blow. "Can't you see anything, or talk anything, but our going up there to live? It's enough for me that dad just looked at me tonight with the old look in his eyes; that somehow he's smashed that confounded wall between us; that— But what's the use? Never mind the dinner. We won't go."

"Nonsense, Burke! Don't be silly. Of course we're going! I wouldn't miss it for the world—under the circumstances." And Helen, with an air of finality, rose to her feet to prepare for bed.

Her husband, looking after her with eyes that were half resigned, half rebellious, for the second time that evening, gave a sigh of utter weariness, and turned away.

They went to the dinner. Helen became really very interested and enthusiastic in her preparations for it; and even Burke, after a time, seemed to regain a little of his old eagerness. They had, to be sure, nearly a quarrel over the dress and hat that Helen wished to wear. But after some argument, and not a few tears, she yielded to her husband's none too gently expressed abhorrence of the hat in question (which was a new one), and of the dress—one he had always disliked.

"But I wanted to make a good impression," pouted Helen.

"Exactly! So do I want you to," returned her husband significantly. And there the matter ended.

It was not a success—that dinner. Helen, intent on making her "good impression," very plainly tried to be admiring, entertaining, and solicitous of her host's welfare and happiness. She resulted in being nauseatingly flattering, pert, and inquisitive. John Denby, at first very evidently determined to give no just criticism for his own behavior, was the perfection of courtesy and cordiality. Even when, later, he was unable quite to hide his annoyance at the persistent and assiduous attentions and questions of his daughter-in-law, he was yet courteous, though in unmistakable retreat.

Burke Denby—poor Burke! With every sense and sensitiveness keyed to instant response to each tone and word and gesture of the two before him, each passing minute was, to Burke, but a greater torture than the one preceding it. Long before dinner was over, he wished himself and Helen at home; and as soon as was decently possible after the meal, he peremptorily suggested departure.

"I couldn't stand it! I couldn't stand it another minute," he told himself passionately, as he hurried Helen down the long elm-shaded walk leading to the street. "But dad—dad was a brick! And he asked us to come again. Again! Good Heavens! As if I'd go through that again! It was so much worse there than at home. But I'm glad he didn't put her in mother's chair. I don't think even I could have stood that—today!"

"Well, that's over," murmured Helen complacently, as they turned into the public sidewalk—"and well over! Still, I didn't enjoy myself so very much, and I don't believe you did, either," she laughed, "else you wouldn't have been in such a taking to get away."

There was no answer. Helen, however, evidently sure of her ground, did not seem to notice. She yawned pleasantly.

"Guess I'm sleepy. Ate too much. 'Twas a good dinner; and, just as I told your father, things always taste

WHITE LEAD

A Keg of White-Lead

This Paint Triumphs Over Water

White-lead and linseed oil form a natural alliance against water. So strong is their mutual attraction that if linseed oil is added to a mixture of white-lead and water, the white-lead immediately unites with the linseed oil and excludes the water to the very last drop.

Dutch Boy white-lead is the union of pure linseed oil and finely ground pure white-lead, thus forming a paint which excludes destructive moisture and decay from your buildings. Such is the paint triumphant.

On inside walls of office or home, Dutch Boy white-lead, mixed with flatting oil and colored any exact tint or shade, provides artistic decoration which will neither fade nor become shiny, and yet is as perfectly washable as your china plates.

Dutch Boy red-lead is the guardian of iron and steel—it is certain defense against rust. Like white-lead, it is impervious to water and it sticks tight to any metal. Whether your metal property be house fixtures (gutters, pipes, railings, etc.) or machinery, or implements, or bridges, this paint will add years to its life and usefulness.

Write for Paint Facts No. 64 and learn how to make your property look well and last long.

This Metal Triumphs Over Friction

Friction is a necessary condition in this world of ours. Without it wheels would not grip the tracks, electricity could not be generated. But friction in the wrong place and at the wrong time is the arch enemy of progress. It lays its retarding grasp on every machine—the rushing locomotive, the fleet motor, the busy milling engines—and turns their power to self-destruction.

Standing guard between the machines and this destroying friction are the bearing metals.

Dutch Boy bearing metals comprise compositions for every form of machine, for meeting every kind of friction. Whatever the machine, whatever the friction, they minimize both friction and cost.

There is Dutch Boy Phoenix metal for heavy strains and high speeds, No. 1 Journal for heavy strains but low speeds, Special Genuine for hardware and mill trade, and many other grades.

So also, Dutch Boy solders embrace a complete line. Each exact composition is numbered and can always be duplicated.

especially good when you don't get much at home. I said it on purpose. I thought maybe 'twould make him think."

Still silence.

Helen turned sharply and peered into her husband's face.

"What's the matter?" she demanded suspiciously. "Why are you so glum?"

Burke, instantly alert to the danger of having another scene such as had followed Gleason's first visit, desperately ran to cover.

"Nothing, nothing!" He essayed a gay smile, and succeeded. "I'm stupid, that's all. Maybe I'm sleepy myself."

"It can't be you're put out 'cause we came away so early! You suggested it yourself." Her eyes were still suspiciously bent upon him.

"Not a bit of it! I wanted to come."

She relaxed and took her gaze off his face. The unmistakable sincerity in his voice this last time had carried conviction.

"Hm-m; I thought you did," she murmured contentedly again. "Still, I was kind of scared when you proposed it. I didn't suppose 'twas proper to eat and run. Mother always said so. Do you think he minded it—your father?"

"Not a bit!" Burke, in his thankfulness to have escaped the threatened scene, was enabled to speak lightly, almost gayly.

"Hm-m. Well, I'm glad. I wouldn't have wanted him to mind. I tried to be specially nice to him, didn't I?"

"You did, certainly." Burke's lips came together a little grimly; but Helen's eyes were turned away; and after a moment's pause she changed the subject—to her husband's infinite relief.

CHAPTER IX

A Bottle of Ink

BURKE DENBY did not attempt to deceive himself after that Sunday dinner. His marriage had been a mistake, and he knew it. He was disappointed, ashamed, and angry. He told himself that he was heartbroken; that he still loved Helen dearly—only he did not like to be with her now. She made him nervous, and rubbed him the wrong way. Her mood never seemed to fit in with his. She had so many little ways—

Sometimes he told himself irritably that he believed that, if it were a big thing like a crime that Helen had committed, he could be heroic and forgiving, and glory in it. But forever to battle against a succession of never-ending irritations, always to encounter the friction of antagonistic aims and ideals—it was maddening. He was ashamed of himself, of course. He was ashamed of lots of things that he said and did. But he could not help an explosion now and then. He felt as if somewhere, within him, was an irresistible force driving him to it.

And the pity of it! Was he not, indeed, to be pitied? What had he not given up? As if it were his fault that he was now so disillusioned! He had supposed that marriage with Helen would be a fresh joy every morning, a new delight every evening, an unbelievable glory of happiness—just being together.

Now—he did not want to be together. He did not want to go home to fretfulness, fault-finding, slovenliness, and perpetual criticism. He wanted to go home to peace and harmony, big, quiet rooms, servants that knew their business, and—dad.

And that was another thing—dad. Dad had been right. He himself had been wrong. But that did not mean that it was easy to own up that he had been wrong. Sometimes he hardly knew which cut the deeper; that he had been proved wrong, thus losing his happiness, or that his father had been proved right, thus placing him in a position to hear the hated "I told you so."

That Helen could never make him happy Burke was convinced now. Never had he realized this so fully as since seeing her at his father's table that Sunday. Never had her "ways" so irritated him. Never had he so poignantly realized the significance of what he had lost—and won. Never had he been so ashamed—or so ashamed because he was ashamed—as on that day. Never, he vowed, would he be placed in the same position again.

As to Helen's side of the matter—Burke quite forgot that there was such a thing. When one is so very sorry for one's self, one forgets to be sorry for anybody else. And Burke was, indeed, very sorry for himself. Having never been in the habit of taking disagreeable medicine, he did not know how to take it now. Having been always accustomed to consider only himself, he considered only himself now. That Helen, too, might be disappointed and disillusioned never occured to him.

full, the roads inviting and the air delightful. Here and there the lights of a rambling residence shone from some rounded knoll above which the stately pines rose in silhouette against the glorious Southern Cross. After more than an hour of walking and a dozen questions, we arrived at the corral and, by accident, came upon the cottage where she was staying. After a false start and a new start I made the four kilometers back to the hotel in forty minutes.

I slept well, getting up at two A. M. and putting on a sweater coat and pulling the blankets closer around me.

Shivering in the Philippines! Brr-rr-r!

We spent next morning selecting horses, or rather ponies, for our trip and visiting the dog market, where the Igorotes bought and sold half-starved canines with visions of a great feast off the protruding ribs. The Igorotes are about as much like the cultured Filipinos as they are like cultured Americans or cultured Japanese; but the fact that the Igorotes eat dogs has done as much to prejudice us against the Filipinos as has the story that the Chinese eat rats to turn us against the well-bred Chinese, who not only do not eat rats, but even have a distaste for caviar and limburger.

Our first twelve kilometers from Baguio were made in a motor-car on a narrow trail, with primitive bridges and sharp turns. On the way we passed parties of Igorotes returning from the mountain metropolis, leading gaunt dogs with cords in the middle of which a stick was tied, or black porkers with lead reins knotted through their ears. Our motor-car caused no surprise. Mr. Moss, whose thirteen years among the mountain peoples makes him an authority, says that the Igorotes would be surprised if the Americans did not surprise them.

Mounting our small ponies, we rode for eighteen kilometers over high trails, then on the hillside opposite, stood the log hut that was to house us for the night. A sharp gallop of a few minutes brought us to the rest-house at Camp Thirty, thirty kilometers from Baguio.

Our evening meal was excellent and the big fire was a welcome companion. After dinner we stepped out into the moonlight. Some one said, "This is Sunday," and the reverent answer was, "I don't believe I ever worshiped God more truly than today!"

I went out to see how my little buckskin pony was faring, and after he had rubbed his nose against my hand I left the dark stable and walked slowly to the rough hut that was home for the night. One great pine stood out black and mighty against the sky in which the last light of day lingered. As I entered the big room where the men sat around the bright fire, I noticed that I had been humming,

"Now the day is over,
Night is drawing nigh;
Shadows of the evening
Steal across the sky."

Up there, on the "long, long trail a-winding back to the land of my dreams," a song had spontaneously sprung to my lips. It was Sunday, and that was my evening hymn, high up on the mountain-side, under the stars.

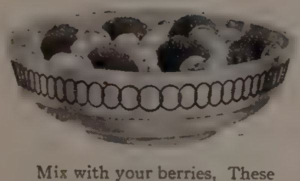
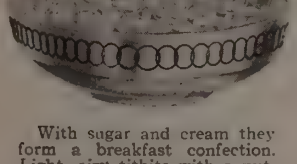
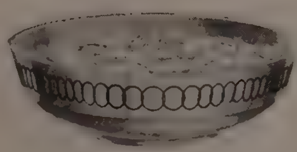
When Puffed Grains and Strawberries Come Served Together, Summer is at Hand



Mix with your berries. These are crusty, flaky, flimsy morsels, and they form a delightful blend. They add as much as crust adds to a shortcake.



With sugar and cream they form a breakfast confection. Light, airy titbits with a nut-like taste. Yet a whole-grain food.



Serve them in every bowl of milk. No other morsels are so good as bubbled grains. They are flavory, thin and crisp.

A million times daily—this summer—these Bubble Grains will be served to children in some delightful way.

Every morning, in many a home, will find some Puffed Grain on the table.

Every night, with countless children, the bedtime dish will be Puffed Grains in milk.

All summer long, the berry dishes will have Puffed Grains mixed in. The ice cream dish will have some Puffed Grain on it. Candy will be made with Puffed Grains. And children at play will carry bags of Puffed Grains with them.

Why This Popularity?

Stop and consider what gave Puffed Grains this universal vogue. Of all the cereal dainties, they stand first.

Of course, they are food confections. They are toasted, flaky globules. They taste like bubbled nuts. No other grain foods ever had so many fascinations.

But there's a deeper reason. Puffed Wheat and Rice are whole-grain foods. And all the world's authorities are urging folks to whole grains.

And here the whole grain is made wholly digestible. Every food cell is exploded. Every atom feeds.

These are Prof. Anderson's creations—the ultimate in scientific foods. A hundred million steam explosions occur in every kernel. By no other process are whole grains so fitted to digest.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice
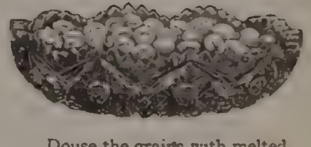
and Corn Puffs
Each 15c Except in Far West

These are all-day foods in summer. Keep the three kinds constantly on hand. Let them take the place of sweetmeats, cookies, peanuts, popcorn—things not so good for children.

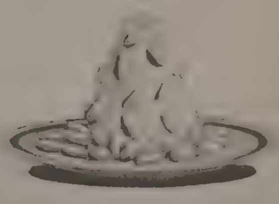
Puffed Grains are all nutrition. Each ounce is worth ten ounces of some foods. And they never tax the stomach.

When such foods come in such delightful forms, serve them in abundance.

The Quaker Oats Company
Sole Makers



Douse the grains with melted butter for hungry children between meals. These nut-like bits cannot upset the stomach.



Scatter Puffed Grains on ice cream, to give it a nutty flavor. They will seem to melt away.

Use in place of nut meats in home candy making. They make the candy porous—easier to eat. And they taste like nuts.

The Holy Spirit and His Work

International Sunday School Lesson for May 27
John 15 : 26 to 16 : 14

Our Unseen Helper

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HOW considerate Jesus was! These closing chapters of John show his loving watch-care over his disciples. When he saw the dismay that came over them as he prophesied his fate, he hastened to give them a great promise of assurance. "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Helper, that he may be with you for ever." Let us study together the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in a very practical way. For we too feel very uncertain and helpless at times, just as the humble Galileans who had fellowship with Jesus. We need to know the Great Companion, the Unseen Friend, whom we so often forget.

Among the peoples for whom the Bible was first written, names were very significant. Get your boys and girls to make a list themselves of the ways in which John refers to the Spirit of God.

The Revised Verson gives us three alternatives in translating the Greek word: Comforter, Advocate and Helper. The original is "Paraclete," that is, some one who comes up alongside, a champion, a friend at need, especially a "counsel for the defense." I suppose the biggest, broadest word is Helper, the Helper when all others fail, helping in countless ways according to all our need.

Besides, the Spirit is Guide and Teacher, Revealer of New Truth, Reminder of Old Teachings, Witness and Prosecutor and Judge in turn.

The grand good word that is dearest to us all is "The Comforter." Ian Maclaren told young ministers that people need the Gospel of comfort more than anything else. "Are the consolations of God too small for thee?" Then you are making a mistake somewhere, for, as Paul told the Corinthians, our Father is the God of All Comfort. Take up your concordance and look at the Bible as a Book of Comfort. You'll find rich reading there concerning the comfort we can have—and share. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God."

It is the Spirit who brings that unearthly strength and calm to the tortured sufferer. It is the Spirit who enables us to bear the sorrow and pain of bereavement. He is our Reminder, bringing to memory the exceeding precious promises: "As thy day, so shall thy strength be"; "My peace give I unto you"; "Lo, I am with you alway."

HOW many errors in religion have sprung from a feeling that God is far off, that for two thousand years he has not communicated with his children, that they have only a written Book by which to learn his will! For the Bible itself demands and promises the guidance of the living Spirit. He it is who takes the things of Jesus and makes them plain to us. Our Holy Scriptures are not an obscure map which we must decipher for ourselves, nor a series of mysterious puzzles to solve, as some folk seem to think. They are the written record of the experiences of men whose hearts God had touched. As we read, the same Spirit burns within us.

We ought all to believe in the inner light! "He shall guide you into all the truth." The human spirit is competent to know and serve God. Because the Holy Spirit is with us to guide we can find out the right way by prayer and meditation, serious thought, and planning with divine help.

He leads us step by step one day at a time. If we stick to the counsels of this Guide, our path shall brighten unto the perfect day.

The vast reserves of God are not exhausted even by the Bible. Jesus had many things to say that his friends were not ready for. Some of these come to us in the rest of the New Testament, authenticated by the Spirit of Truth. Others came in succeeding generations, as the Spirit led the minds of saints in all ages.

We must be ready to follow and trust our guide. We must not be afraid of the new. Neither must we close our hearts to his reminders of the old. The church has been so timid and fearful when the new revelation comes. She could not see for years that the Spirit wanted human slavery abolished. She was distrustful when the men of science traced the ways of God in the heavens and the earth. She was frightened when they showed how God prepared the world through millions of years of development, instead of rejoicing to know more of his ways of working.

Just so are individuals. We are content with what we already know, instead of pressing on. We have not put away childish things. We are trying to live on the ideas that we formed years ago, instead of "increasing in the knowledge of God."

Our lesson tells us that the Sprit convicts the world of sin and righteousness and judgment. What does this mean to us?

First of all, that the Holy Spirit works on men's consciences. He convinces us of the eternal distinction between right and wrong, and where we have committed the wrong, it is he who causes the sense of shame and failure. God's work is begun when a man is conscious of his insufficiency and yearns for godliness. The Spirit will not let us rest in wickedness.

We must also be convinced that we can be and ought to be righteous. Otherwise our case would be the worse for the conviction of sin. We are shown an ideal in Christ. The Spirit imparts a power by which we can rise nearer to him. It opens up a way of escape from the power of evil.

In the third place, we are shown plainly that sin brings death and righteousness life, and that the judgments of the Almighty are inexorable. A certainty that good and bad are forever separable and distinct, a conviction that our lives and conduct are of eternal importance, these are among the great works of the Spirit.

TO dismiss the doctrine of the Trinity as a mystery passing understanding is to make faith unreasonable and ineffectual. What possible value can there be in such jugglery of ideas? The Trinity grew out of the actual experience of the men of the New Testament, an experience which we can share. Humanly speaking, they thought of God in three ways, as manifesting himself to the world in three great aspects:

First, God is the All-Father, the Creator, the Supreme Being whom all men seek to know and to worship.

Secondly, God is the Self-revealing One, who has manifested himself in man his creature, in the course of human history, in the great prophets and pioneers of religion, but above all in Jesus of Nazareth: "For it was the good pleasure of the Father that in him should all the fulness dwell."

Thirdly, God is the Self-giving One, the immanent, ever-present Spirit moving upon the hearts of all men whom he has made, pleading, yearning, comforting, inspiring, leading upward and onward forever. The Spirit is God working upon the souls of his children now and here.

Through the ages the Spirit has been witnessing for Christ in human hearts, in the signs of the times and the lessons of great events. The Spirit sent out the cloud of witnesses throughout the world in the first century, and still, in the twentieth, lays hold of chosen men to go into the uttermost parts of the earth.

The great urgency of the Spirit was on Martin Luther when he stood before the imperial court and said, "I can do no otherwise." Why could he not retract, recede? A Power not himself was compelling him to bear witness. The Divine Guide was using him to bring the Christian world back to the Gospel.

COMPLETE $1.40 NOVEL FOR 50 CENTS

"The Road to Understanding"

By ELEANOR H. PORTER, Author of "Pollyanna"

ELEANOR H. PORTER, the author of "Just David" and "Pollyanna," has created two of the most famous child characters in fiction.

In her new book, "The Road to Understanding," she shows equal insight into the hearts of children of a larger growth. The theme of the story is as old as love—the marriage of a poor girl to a rich man. Every novel-reader—every one who has ever known of a similar situation—knows there followed misunderstandings and estrangement. In spite of the fine courage with which they began their life together, Burke and Helen Denby found in their own characters insidious, unlooked-for traits which threatened to destroy their happiness. With intense interest the reader follows the development of their characters, as under the discipline of life the pleasure-loving girl becomes a noble and charming woman, and the hero ripens to responsible and sympathetic manhood. The happy ending holds surprise as well as pleasure.

In illustrating the story Mrs. Blumenschein has caught the spirit of Mrs. Porter's theme and the personality of her characters, so that the story is one of those rare ones in which story and pictures are in gratifying harmony.

"The Road to Understanding" began in the April 4th issue of the Christian Herald, and will continue in every issue for several months. It is also published in book form at $1.40. You will get this story complete by taking advantage of the following

A New Serial by Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

THIS delightful story has all the sweetness, inspiration and human appeal of the "Pollyanna" stories, so justly famous, which first appeared in the pages of the Christian Herald. It is charmingly written, and in the telling Mrs. Porter reveals a truly wonderful insight into human nature—especially the feminine side of it.

BILLY SUNDAY'S NEW YORK REVIVAL

BILLY SUNDAY'S revival meetings, which began in New York on April 8th, and will continue for three months, will be the biggest ever held. The Tabernacle seats 20,000 persons, who will listen twice a day to the evangelist. Forty thousand persons a day! Think of it! In all, far more than 3,000,000 people will hear him speak. More than 300 churches are actively interested in the movement. A special effort is being made to enroll 50,000 men in the Bible classes. Among the most picturesque features are the trained choruses of 2,000 voices, each arranged in three distinct choirs—that is to say 6,000 voices.

The Christian Herald is publishing a weekly sermon by Billy Sunday, selected by himself, during his campaign in New York, and, being on the spot and in touch with the great evangelist, we believe our descriptions of the outstanding incidents of the momentous campaign will give an intimate insight into this the greatest of all revivals.

THE GREATER UNITED STATES, or, OUR NEW INDUSTRIAL EMPIRE

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

IN the May 9th issue of the Christian Herald appeared the first of a series of travel articles by Mr. Carpenter who will make extensive trips throughout the United States covering the great agricultural and industrial centers. He will take up the great industries and show the new things that are taking place in them, especially drugs, dyes, etc. These articles will deal with New England, with the newest South, with the Mississippi Valley. He will show what is going on in and about the Great Lakes from Buffalo to Duluth, including the vast iron mines on which our manufacturing industry is founded.

Mr. Carpenter will tell about the fast-growing Southwest, including the oil and gasoline centers of Texas and Oklahoma, the new States of Arizona and New Mexico, and also the Northwest and the Pacific Slope.

The Rockies, with their gold and silver, and the mountains of copper now being mined with steam shovels, will give interesting stories, as will also Uncle Sam's work in exploiting our National Parks, and in reclaiming the desert and in draining the swamps.

The Sunday School Lesson

So with the mighty evangelists of modern times. John Wesley was driven by the Spirit out into the fields and the coalpits to impart vital religion to the common people of England. In Methodism a new influx of spiritual power came into Protestantism. And our God, who is no respecter of persons and giveth his Spirit unto all, has made spiritual religion the greatest single factor in democracy and freedom among the nations." "They shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make them free."

Wherever humble folk have striven and suffered, wherever consecrated teachers have labored and persevered, wherever sincere believers have fellowship in service, there the Holy Spirit has glorified the Christ.

Superintendent's Talk on the Golden Text

"He shall teach you all things."

JESUS was a great Teacher. He made the highest truths clear to the poor and ignorant. He illustrated his lessons with simple, beautiful stories. No one can read about the Good Samaritan and his care of the wounded victim of the robbers, without understanding that Jesus counts neighborliness a necessary part of Christianity.

But we can't go to Jesus and ask questions just as those disciples did. Jesus knew they would miss this and promised them another Teacher, the Holy Spirit, who should come to them at any time of need, anywhere. He would bring to their remembrance all things that Jesus said to them. New things would he reveal to those who listened and prayed.

When the lessons are hard, call the Spirit of Jesus to help. In times when we do not know just what to do, ask God to guide. When you are worried, learn of him. "He shall teach you."

Paul was given a big task to perform. He had to go out into the heathen world and preach the Gospel. But the Spirit taught him all things needful. So with the humblest convert in a dark land. Though he be unable even to read and write, God teaches him the secret of trust. Then he leads him on to study as well as to pray, to become a reader of the Bible, to become a trained Christian leader, able to guide others to light.

When the Spirit of God comes to us, we want to grow, to learn, to advance in grace and strength and usefulness. He will teach us some lessons whether we will or not; but the joyous Christian is the one who welcomes the Unseen Helper and says with the psalmist, "Teach me to do thy will; for thou art my God."

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World Sunday School Association

Live Items for Missionary Sunday

A GREAT Filipino rally. Think of a Sunday school rally of 5,000 in one gathering in the far-off Philippines. It has just happened at Manila, and is the largest single evangelical affair ever held in the islands.

The man who brought it about is Rev. J. S. McLaughlin, Sunday School Secretary for the Philippines of the World's Sunday School Association, and the American Bible Society's representative. He induced the railway company to grant a 49 per cent. reduction on a round-trip one-day ticket, and to run a special train. Sixteen hundred people came in on these trains, arriving at the same time at the Grand Central Station. One thousand friends with bands of music were there to welcome them, and then followed a parade through the streets to three large buildings, where three simultaneous services were held. The big event occurred in the afternoon at the base-ball park, at which some 5,000 people were in attendance. After plenty of music and two short speeches the whole crowd knelt for a consecration service for power to go out and accomplish two great things: the making of better schools and bigger schools. After that there was a torchlight procession, which stretched out through the heart of the city for more than a mile and created a splendid impression.

The success of the affair was in spite of the apathy of the press and other public agencies. The Spanish inspector sent out to bring in the special train told Mr. McLaughlin that he went out under protest, feeling that it was an insult to have to bring in such a set of "Protestantes." He had never come into close contact with any Protestants before, but he said it was a revelation to him. As he put it: "I have never seen such a decent, clean and well-behaved crowd in all my life in the Philippines before. Ordinarily, before our coaches go through four stations, they look like pig-pens; but these, although they have come sixty miles, are still as clean as a parlor, and out of the eight hundred people on board I have seen but two using cigars or cigarettes. I never saw such a thing before."

The Sunday school is making rapid growth in the Philippines. In one province, that of Bulacan, the membership grew from 1,800 to 8,000 in two years, with 2,500 conversions. And sixteen years ago, there was not a Sunday school in the Philippines!

An Appeal on Behalf of War Prisoners

AN urgent request by cable has recently been received by the Gospel Committee for Work Among War Prisoners, for over $10,000 for the purpose of placing Gospel literature in the hands of Serbian, Rumanian, French, English, Polish, Ruthenian, Italian, Lettish, and Croatian prisoners of war in various prison camps in Germany and Austria. The appeal includes a request for the continuance of similar distribution for the multitudes of Russian prisoners, among whom the work of evangelization by the spoken word and the printed Gospel has been so signally blessed during the past months. Among the results has been the actual organization of evangelical churches in different camps, for the use of which military barracks have been set aside by the commanding officers in charge. Christian men among the prisoners assist the more experienced agents in the conduct of religious services and in the work of winning their fellow prisoners to Jesus Christ. Readers desiring to contribute may send their gifts to the Christian Herald, designating them for this specific purpose.

Among these children lies one of the greatest opportunities in the world for productive work by this society. They need literature—books and papers, religious and moral—that will direct their lives along lines of useful Christian effort; literature that will offset the effect of the vicious books and pamphlets that are so freely circulated by agencies of the devil.

In all of the districts where the Union's missionaries are working—the New England, New York, Home, Northern, Central, Western, Upper Coast, Lower Coast, Rocky Mountain, Southwestern, and Southern Districts—similar conditions exist in a greater or a lesser degree. And everywhere the same wonderful results are being produced by these self-sacrificing workers.

Thus, literally, millions of children have been taught the principles of Christianity and the advantages of upright living, many of whom otherwise, in all probability, would never have known the Word of God or the meaning of worship in any form; and in addition to these millions of children, many thousands of parents have become converted to Christian living as a direct result of the society's work.

The Union has distributed by sale and by gift more than ten million dollars' worth of morally sound, instructive literature. The society also carries a full line of Sunday school supplies and requisites for the equipment of new Sunday schools which are constantly being organized and which frequently are without adequate funds in their early stages.

With results of such incalculable value to look back upon and still greater results anticipated for the future, the Union's managers and co-workers may justly feel a deep sense of satisfaction and pride in the celebration of a whole century of uplifting service.

Beginning with the administration of Alexander Henry, its first president, the Union has had among its officers and committee members many nationally prominent figures, including authors, statesmen, jurists, financiers and merchants. Active in the upbuilding of the Union were such men as John McLean, its second president, who was congressman, postmaster general, and justice of the United States Supreme Court; Francis Scott Key, who attained national fame as the author of "The Star-Spangled Banner"; Henry Clay Trumbull, widely known lecturer and author; Hon. William Strong, justice of the United States Supreme Court; Morris K. Jesup, noted financier and philanthropist and president of the New York Chamber of Commerce; John A. Brown, financier and founder of the house of Brown Brothers of Philadelphia, New York and London; Jay Cooke, financier of world-wide renown; James Pollock, governor of Pennsylvania and director of the Philadelphia mint; Theodore Frelinghuysen, United States senator; William H. Wanamaker, and many other men of high standing and sterling character. Among the Society's famous editors have been such men as Samuel Austin Allibone, LL.D., author of the "Dictionary of Authors," a monumental and standard work; and Richard Newton, D.D., known as "the prince of children's preachers."

The principal officers, at present, are: president, Martin Luther Finckel; vice-presidents, Clarkson Clothier and James F. Stone, M.D.; recording secretary, William H. Hirst; treasurer, John E. Stevenson. The board of managers consists of laymen of seven denominations. The headquarters are at 1816 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, fully occupying a large four-story building where an extensive force of people is employed.

A Notable Luther Book

"FOUR HUNDRED YEARS."* This is the title of a volume of essays by twenty-six Lutheran professors and pastors, with a chronological table and a stirring introduction by Professor Dau, the whole making up a timely volume dealing with the great Reformation of which Martin Luther was the pivotal figure, and the quadricentennial of which the Christian Church is celebrating this year. None by reason of learning and devotion are more fitted to write of Luther than are these contributors to this volume. We had reason to expect from them something worth while on the subject and in this we have not been disappointed.

The essays are very much to the point and deal with their topics in a convincing manner. They treat of the work of Luther, its effect both past and present, and also of the man, his family and his friends. There runs through the book a spirit of earnest endeavor to impress on its readers the conviction that nothing since the dawn of Christianity has been of so much importance as the Reformation, and that Luther was divinely chosen, not only to initiate but to bring to a successful conclusion this great cause, the results of which are apparent today, not only in religious but in social and political conditions as well. The essays are well written; all are instructive, and some of them are highly entertaining and fascinating. Luther at Worms, by Pastor Broecker; Luther's Marriage, by Pastor Czamanske, and Luther's Two Exiles, by Pastor H. Fricke, are well worth reading again and again. The essay by Professor Dau is in the vigorous and scholarly style so favorably known to Christian Herald readers, while that by Professor Pannkoke shows the logical precision we are accustomed to find in his writings.

Mammy of Six Hundred Children

IN the midst of one of the fine residence sections of Asheville, North Carolina, stands the old cabin of Aunt Tempy Avery. Her front yard runs down to the paved street, and from her back door she commands a view of the far-famed Mount Pisgah and "the Rat." Many tempting offers have been received by the old mammy for her valuable holding, but never has she wavered in her refusal. "My ole marster gave me dis home when he died," she would explain, "to be mine ontel I dies."

Nobody knows just the age of Mammy Tempy, though she unhesitatingly asserts that she is one hundred and six. It is said that she was a chattel of considerable value in the year 1840, when she was given as a wedding present to her "Young Mistis" from her "Ole Mistis." This new "mistis" and her children and children's children she served faithfully for many a year. In all these and the later years, when she "hired out," she cared for between five and six hundred babies, "fust and last."

As a girl she was married to one Si Haynes, a servant on a neighboring plantation. After seven children had been born to them, the pair separated. "I ain' never seen him fum dat day to dis," Mammy explains. "After so long a time I reckoned he was dead."

In all she has had nine children (two by a second husband). She points with delight, as her visitors listen to her tales of olden times, to the little fifth generation in its mother's arms. Under the home roof are still living representatives of four generations, the baby, its mother, great-grandmother, and great-great-grandmother.

Day by day Mammy sits by her fire, or on the little front porch in the sunshine. She has many friends new and old, but her heart is with the ancient régime. Her hair is white now, her face seamed with wrinkles, and her shoulders bent; but her eyes sparkle with intelligence, and her voice has still the cheerful ring of youth.

Eliminating Poisons That Clog Our Systems

By R. H. Sinclair

IT is now generally recognized by eminent physicians and medical scientists that a host of the most aggravating ills that afflict men and women of today are directly caused by our sedentary habits. The large intestine, or colon, is no longer able to eliminate promptly the body's waste matter in which virulent poisons are formed and absorbed by the blood.

Auto-intoxication with all its consequences is the result—headaches, backaches, dizziness, lassitude, indigestion, and their complications—neurasthenia, mental and physical exhaustion, high blood pressure, kidney and liver disorders, skin diseases, and many more serious maladies.

The sole service rendered by the colon is to receive from the digestive organs the body's waste matter and to eject it. When it fails promptly and regularly to perform its duty, processes of putrefaction and decay proceed rapidly in its contents and poisonous toxins are formed and released into the blood by absorption through the mucous membranes.

Professor Verchow many years ago discovered in making hundreds of post mortem examinations of the colon that intestinal congestion prevailed universally, regardless of the cause of death. Other eminent physicians of today report exactly the same condition.

From these facts it can readily be seen that the colon can rightfully be regarded as the seat of nearly all ailments. It is, in fact, a very hotbed of disease, comparable to a garbage can in the home. Professor Metchnikoff, the famous director of the Pasteur Institute of Paris, regards colon poisons as the direct cause of premature death.

One of the first warnings of auto-intoxication is constipation and indigestion. Victims of chronic constipation are multiplying with remarkable rapidity. Many of us suffer from constipation without even knowing it, yet it is due to this condition known as intestinal congestion that so many of us are far below par physically and mentally most of the time.

If we were able to live outdoors and to exercise vigorously every day, our colons would be able to function properly; for exercise is the greatest and most satisfactory colon stimulant known.

To most of us this is not possible. We have neither the time nor the inclination to take vigorous exercise. Instead we dose ourselves with laxative drugs, mineral waters, and other nostrums, with the result that while we get temporary relief we not only aggravate the condition but find that repetitions of the same dose later fail to produce results.

But relief, even when obtained, is not sufficient. To maintain health and efficiency it is absolutely of paramount importance to create and maintain day in and day out freedom from intestinal poisons and this is impossible with laxatives.

There is a new way, however, to keep the colon sweet and clean—a way which has the same effect as vigorous exercise, yet without the inconvenience or time-consuming features of exercise. And the results are even better because the treatment is localized.

The principle upon which this new method is founded is the same as that used in massage. We all know that massage has the same effect as exercise—it stimulates the nerves and strengthens the muscles. Colon massage as practiced by osteopaths has proved wonderfully effective.

This new method of massaging the colon involves the use of a device called the Kolon Motor—a mechanical masseur, the face of which is shaped to fit over the colon when placed against the abdomen. You merely put the Kolon Motor on a door or wall, lean up against it and turn the handle for a few moments. The face rotates with a scientific waving motion which immediately stimulates the colon and causes proper functioning. A couple of minutes in the morning each day is all that is required and unless your experience is different from the hundreds of other users you will feel like a new person after the very first application.

Before the Kolon Motor was offered to the public a number of well-known physicians were acquainted with its merits and used it in their practice. Without exception the results were most gratifying—in fact, every physician who has tested the Kolon Motor endorses it most highly.

Martin's Method, Incorporated, Dept. 155, 50 East Thirty-first Street, New York, has prepared a booklet called Intestinal Cleanliness, which they will be pleased to send gratis to all readers of this magazine. In this booklet the Kolon Motor is clearly illustrated and its application shown. It also contains a scientific discussion of auto-intoxication, and explains why and how the Kolon Motor produces such assured results. Letters from well-known physicians relating their experience with the Kolon Motor also form a part of the book.

There may be some who scoff at the idea of colon hygiene and its direct relation to health and efficiency, but the wiser ones will either write or send the coupon below for this free book and learn what this wonderful device is accomplishing for so many others.

The By-Products of War

ORPHANS and misery are two of the inevitable by-products of armed conflict. The father who dies at the front has his name emblazoned, at least for one brief moment, upon the roll of honor, but the child who stays at home or who is enveloped in the surging tide of invasion sees little of the glory of his father's death and knows only the heart-ache, the loss, the hunger of the uncared for. Only in Christian lands are orphans cared for; Christians, only, see in misery an opportunity and a call for help. The Christian Herald Family has evidenced since the opening of the war and is still evidencing in a steady stream of gifts its Christianity and its determination to leave as little as possible of the war's misery uncomforted, as little as possible of its hunger unstayed, and as few as possible of its widows and orphans unsheltered and unfed. Relief work is going forward in all fields regardless of the spread of the crimson tide of war.

Please address all gifts to War Widows and Orphans Relief Work, Room 93 Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State any preference you may have as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

BISHOP WARNE, of the M. E. Church, tells this remarkable story of a victory through prayer. A strong Hindu leader had been converted. He was head man over 6,000, who had become Christians, and through his influence the old temple was torn away and a church was built. Later he fell away, and the missionary, returning to the village, found a new temple built immediately adjoining the new Christian church. The missionary went to the bishop and asked him what to do. The bishop told him to "first call a day of prayer." Following this advice he called together all the missionaries, and they met for prayer at a place some thirty miles away. After they had prayed some time one of the lady missionaries arose and said, "I cannot pray any longer; I have victory. It seems I have had a vision and saw the forces of light and darkness battling in the air. The darkness has faded away and light has triumphed." The next morning at daybreak a messenger came and stated that on the previous afternoon at about the hour of the lady's vision the temple had been torn down.

Elijah on Mount Carmel, Moses on Mount Horeb, the disciples before Pentecost, Judson in Burma, Livingstone in Africa, all of these prayed through to victory, but they are only types of unnamed thousands whose prayers have brought divine power to overbear all opposition. It is possible to pray to victory and to know that your prayer is answered. Two members of the Prayer League testify to this.

Mrs. H. G. J. praises God, who has never forsaken his people who put their trust in him. Her husband was taken to the nearest large city for an operation that involved the removal of a large part of the stomach, an operation which the local doctors believed would be of no avail. But she thanks God that the surgeon of the hospital announces her husband on the road to recovery. She earnestly asks the prayers of the League that the family may pass through this trial and be able to pay off the debts they have been obliged to contract.

Another sister was lying on a bed of sickness. Her boys requested the prayers of the League, and now write that she is happily on the way to health. They also are struggling to meet the financial demands made upon them by their mother's sickness, and ask the prayers of God's people that they may have strength to meet the responsibilities thrust upon them.

Mrs. L. R. L. asks the prayers of the League for the greater physical and spiritual health of her daughter, for whose recovery from a dangerous sickness she thanks God.

An Anxious Mother asks prayers for divine guidance in the rearing and instruction of her children.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Farlington, Kan.; Fall River Mills, Calif.; Ghent, Ky. (that many may be saved during revival); Presho, S. D. (that many may be saved during revival); Warsaw, N. Y. (for an outpouring of God's Spirit at Erie Station; Winfield, W. Va. (that a M. E. church may be built in the neighborhood).

Mrs. M. E D asks prayer that husband's mind may be restored; Mrs. M. A. C., that son's mind may be restored; Miss L. B. and M. A. P. that their own minds may be strengthened; eight friends, for mental restoration or strengthening for friends or relatives.

Eight friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves; Mrs. W. W. D., that husband's sight may be restored.

Twenty-eight friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. H B., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; five, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

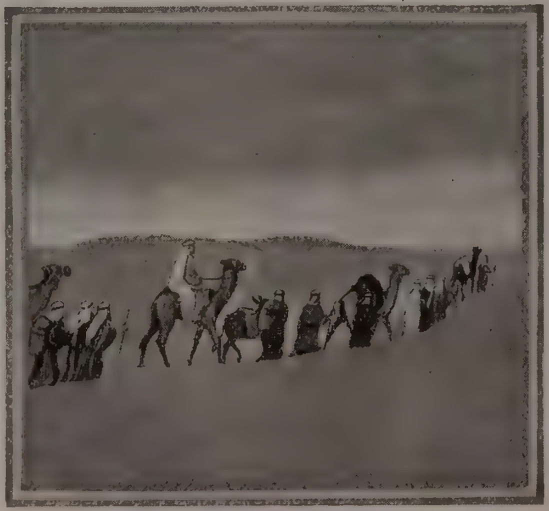
Picture No. 52



Now is the Time!

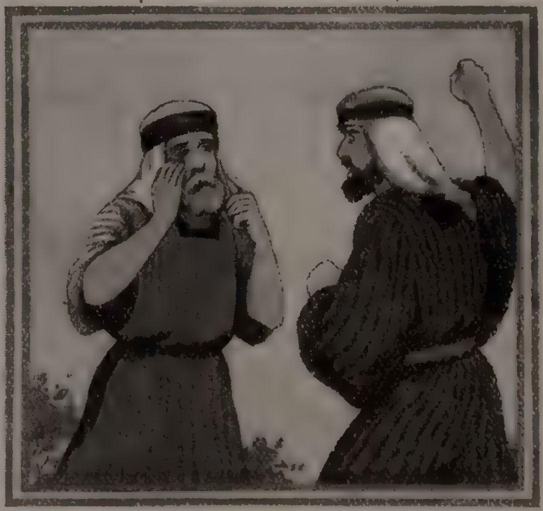
WHEN you order now you will receive your Outfit by return mail, with all 60 pictures, and start immediately to employ your idle moments pleasantly in the home Bible pastime, knowing that you will gain much knowledge and inspiration in that way, and that you may be awarded one of the 1,000 cash rewards. No one anywhere has a better opportunity than you to win a prize—indeed, you may gain the very first award of $1,000 in cash, for only common-sense judgment is used in deciding which Bible verse fits a picture better than others. Those who submit the best verses for the pictures will be given the cash awards.

Now is the harvest time of the Study—all 60 pictures and the Outfit hurried to you immediately, with plenty of time to compete. Yet the closing date, June 27th, is so near that the Study will seem just long enough and not too long. Enter now!

The Rock of Ages

IN these times of world-wide war and questioning many will turn to the Bible for support, guidance and strength. Any contemplation of the Bible must be an influence directing us toward calm judgment, freeing our minds of petty things and holding us firmly in the way of the Lord.

Picture No. 53



Therefore the Bible Picture Study will be a blessing and a refuge. While interested in the matching of verses and pictures you will be absorbing immutable truths; the Study will refresh and revive you.

The Bible Picture Study consists merely of choosing, from "Pearls from the Bible," the verses that best fit or describe the pictures. Begin it without further delay—it will delight you!

Everyone Cared For

WE have taken thought of the situation of all of our readers, in making out the offers for the Bible Picture Study. Of course all may compete without expense, as outlined in the free rules. Offers for the convenient Outfit, with Christian Herald, are as follows:

For Present Subscribers: They may secure the Outfit by sending in $1.00 for a NEW six months' subscription; either collecting the dollar from a new subscriber you have secured, or themselves paying the dollar, and having the Christian Herald sent as a gift to a friend.

Or they may renew for six months, sending in $1.25, as explained in coupon to the right.

Let Us Hope This Baby Won't Reach The Poison

106 children were reported poisoned in the last three years by arsenical fly destroyers. And this is but a fraction of the actual number. Arsenical fly poisoning and cholera infantum symptoms are almost exactly the same. Diagnosis is difficult. And first aid in arsenic poisoning must be quick.

Don't subject your children to this danger. Use the non-poisonous fly catcher safe, sure and efficient, which catches the fly and embalms its body and the deadly germs it carries in a coat of disinfecting varnish.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES WARNING

Earnest A. Sweet, Passed Assistant Surgeon in the United States Public Health Service, makes the following statement in Supplement No. 29 to the Public Health Report: "Of other fly poisons mentioned, mention should be made, merely for a purpose of condemnation, of those composed of arsenic. Fatal cases of poisoning of children through the use of such compounds are far too frequent, and owing to the resemblance of arsenical poisoning to summer diarrhea and cholera infantum, it is believed that the cases reported do not, by any means, comprise the total. Arsenical fly-destroying devices must be rated as extremely dangerous and should never be used, even if other measures are not at hand."

Young People's Topics for May 27

The Gospel Afloat and Awheel

B. Y. P. U. Topic (Conquest Meeting). I Cor. 9 : 20–23

PAUL used every means, that he might save some. The missionary of today is much better equipped with means of conveyance than was Paul. In the Japan inland sea a missionary with a former private yacht is doing a wonderful work for Christ among the people on hundreds of islands. A story of this work will be found in the Christian Herald of January 31. Throughout the archipelagos of the Pacific, sailing-craft and motor-boats enable scattered missionaries to reach far outlying districts which would be impossible without this transportation. On land other missionaries multiply themselves manyfold in many fields by the use of motorcycles and automobiles. The gift of an automobile is to many a mission the equivalent of another paid worker. Jinrikishas, sedan chairs and other man-borne means of carriage are used by other missionaries, nor is the horse, the camel, or the humble mule forgotten. In fact, there is no method by which man moves from place to place that is not used somewhere by the messengers of the King in the carrying of the Gospel to those who are weary of sin yet know not the way of salvation. The most logical result of the consideration of this topic in the Young People's Society would be a movement to present some worthy missionary with a motorcycle, an automobile or a motorboat. A letter addressed to the Rev. John M. Moore, 23 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York City, will put any Young People's Union into touch with a field where they can make such a gift work to the glory of God.

Financing the Kingdom

Christian Endeavor Topic. Luke 19 : 11–26

UNDER the law the Jew was bound to give his tithe to the temple. Since the days of the apostles the question of the tithe has been discussed, but seldom settled except in individual cases. When the Jew had given his tithe, his religious, financial responsibility was ended. He was under the law. We who serve Christ are not under the law but under grace, which is the law of Love. All that we have is ours by the grace of God. It is to be presumed that since the law of the tithe was God-given he who gives a tithe today is at least meeting the expectations of the Saviour in his financial support of the work of the Kingdom. He who gives less than a tithe may be well justified in so doing, but certainly none of us may feel that we are really giving until we have exceeded a tithe. Up to that point it is God's fair share of the income which he has given us to handle in his name.

Any amount of argument can be indulged in upon the subject of tithing, without any other effect than the overheating of the participants. The testimony of those who tithe is, however, unanimous. They have found a joy both in the giving and through it in personal service that they have never known before; and the writer has yet to hear of a tither who, because of his tithing, found himself in distress for lack of funds.

Why I Should Attend a League Institute

Epworth League Topic. Phil. 4:8, 9; 3:12–14

NO matter how great our interest in religious work, no matter how earnest our service, we need a change of scene now and then to give us new interests, new impulses, new vigor, and a wider vision. One of the best things about the Christian life is its possibilities for unlimited growth. With Paul we press on toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. We are constantly arriving at perfection, yet with the ultimate goal steadily before us. The summer institutes are the outgrowth of the need for leadership in the League as in other Young People's organizations. From the sunrise prayer-meeting and the morning watch, through sermon and lecture, Bible study, recreation and the comradeship of earnest young Christians like yourselves, to the falling asleep on your cot in a tent under the stars, each day at some institute is a day of awakening, widening vision and growing faith.

It is the great business of the League to prepare young people for leadership in the church and in the Kingdom. The institutes equip leaders for better leadership themselves and send them back home ready to guide into leadership those who have not had the privilege of the summer camp. Information regarding the various camps may be obtained by addressing R. E. Diffendorfer, Educational Secretary, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City; or by addressing the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A PROSPEROUS Oriental city nestled in a fertile valley between two mountains, and surrounded by gardens and olive groves, Shechem, or Nablus as it is now called, occupies the site of some of the most impressive scenes in Bible history. Here Abraham pitched his tent and made the first stopping-place in his migration to the country of which the Lord said, "Unto thy seed will I give this land." Here Joshua divided the Israelites into two hosts, one of which encamped on the slope of Mount Ebal on the north and the other on the slope of Mount Gerizim on the south, while the Levites read the law of Moses, which was to be the constitution of the infant nation. Shechem seems to have been a sort of capital for the Hebrew nation even after David had established his residence at Jerusalem, as we read in I Kings 12 that all Israel assembled at Shechem to crown Rehoboam. The separatist elements of the nation sought to legitimatize their acts by making Shechem a temporary capital, although the residence of the northern kings was established at a point about six miles northwest, and called Samaria.

Shechem is nowhere mentioned by name in the New Testament, though either it or a suburb appears in John 4:5 under the name of Sychar; and it was here, at Jacob's well, that the Samaritan woman met the Christ and first heard the message of his universal Gospel. Jacob's well is still pointed out, and is almost the only undisputed landmark of our Lord's earthly life. The city now contains about 25,000 inhabitants. Nablus contains a small colony of about 200 persons, who claim to be the descendants of the Israelites of the northern kingdom. They accept only the five books of Moses as being of divine authority, and hold Mount Gerizim to be the seat of their religion, instead of Jerusalem.

A Homely Illustration with a Moral for Every Car Owner

Why is the Cork Tapered?

The humble cork is as efficient in service as it is simple in principle.

It always fits. Why? Because it's tapered.

What has this to do with the bearings on an automobile? Everything.

For a well designed bearing must not only carry the load—it must serve as a "stopper." That's the reason for the cork-shaped form of a Timken Bearing. It must stop the impact that comes with every sway of the car from side to side, with every turn of a curve or corner.

This impact is more technically known as end thrust—the force that presses the whole weight of your car and its burden sideways into the hub of the front wheel as you turn a corner.

Such an impact must be cared for in some way and it is perfectly "stoppered" by the tapered rollers of the Timken Bearing, revolving inside the conical cup which fits into the hub of the wheel.

You cannot wear out a cork. After long use it will simply go into the neck of the bottle a little farther, or a little more snugly.

It's the same way with your Timken Bearings. All bearings will wear in time. With Timken Bearings, the wear is evenly distributed over a large surface. Even after thousands of miles it is difficult to detect this slight wear. But when wear does come in the Timken Bearing it can be entirely taken up by a slight adjustment—merely moving the cone with its rollers a little farther into the cup—and all effect of wear immediately vanishes, leaving the bearing as good as new.

Car manufacturers realize the importance of having bearings that will not wear out at the points of severest service. They realize that the extra cost of Timken Bearings is slight in comparison with the extra protection it affords the car owner.

That is why 83 per cent of the higher grade 1917 cars priced above $700 and made in plants having an annual capacity of 1000 cars or more are equipped at front or rear wheels, differential, pinion or transmission with Timken Bearings.

ROBERT FULTON, American engineer, the first to propel a boat by steam. Original experiment made in 1803 at Paris. In 1807 Fulton built the "Clermont," the first steamboat in America. It plied the Hudson river between New York and Albany.

BECAUSE of the vast importance of the transportation problem, man's genius in every age has been devoted to its advancement. You who glide easily, surely and fast over pike and boulevard in your rubber-shod motor car, are enjoying the fruit of these centuries of effort. Firestone stands for today's highest development in that essential to good travel, the motor vehicle tire. The Organization these tires represent and the man Firestone, whose name they bear, leave nothing undone that research and experiment can do towards perfect transportation. The result is your Firestone Tire, with its Non-Skid hold, sure and quick, on every road, the year through.

KING 8

FOURSOME

Copyright, 1916, by King Motor Car Co.

Mounted on the famous King sixty horse-power chassis adopted for light armored cars by the U. S. Army and U. S. Marine Corps

First of its type, this handsome model is now a pattern for the entire industry. The style and dash of its "destroyer" lines have captivated public and manufacturer alike.

For those who desire the Sport type of car, with long, low, rakish lines, yet designed in perfect taste, this King fears no competition. Narrow and "racy," it seats four in comfort, has lengthy leg-room, and is equipped with four doors.

The two front seats are of the "bucket" type and are each nineteen inches wide. Fitted to the back of these seats is a combination tonneau and "handy" lamp which may be removed from its socket and carried anywhere about the car. This lamp is equipped with a self-coiling cord and returns to its place with little attention. A locked compartment just behind the rear seat provides generous and convenient storage space.

The Foursome is colored deep maroon with white striping and black trimmings. Its white wire wheels are extra equipment.

America Grapples With the Problems of War

MORE and more spectacular grow the evidences of America's participation in the war, as the weeks go by. Every city, town and village has caught the inspiration. Everywhere is the flag, its streaming folds the visible reminder to all that we have entered the great conflict. Khaki-clad men multiply in the cities and processions pass and repass, marching to the tap of the drum and the shrill notes of the fife. Thousands of ordinarily quiet little boroughs have their Defense Leagues, which give the military note to the countryside, now in the verdure of springtime. Everywhere the war is the dominating topic. Farmers are plowing and planting more extensively, to help feed America and the world. All classes and conditions of men are exerting themselves to "do their bit."

Marshal Joffre, Minister of Justice Viviani and our other distinguished French visitors, with the British party led by Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, have been feted and lionized at public receptions and banquets. Their visit to the tomb of Washington a week ago was followed by a pilgrimage to the resting-place of Lincoln at Springfield, Ill., where tributes were paid to the memory of the great war President. On May 9 they came to New York on formal invitation from the mayor and were the guests of the city for three successive days, during which the metropolis, which was a mass of flags and bunting, exerted itself to do them honor by a celebration which included parades, receptions, luncheons, and the presentation of a gift of money to Marshal Joffre and a golden miniature of the Statue of Liberty besides.

But, amid all these formalities and social distractions, the serious business which the nation has in hand is never for a moment forgotten. Food, men, money, munitions, measures effective against U-boats, these are the problems which America, in company with the other nations at war with Germany, faced at the beginning of May. These, too, were the problems which engaged the attention of the British and French commissions and American officials at Washington. It has been clearly stated that the food problem must be solved by the United States. A forecast issued on May 8 by the Department of Agriculture indicated that the winter wheat yield in the United States would be 266,000,000 bushels, the smallest in thirteen years, which, with a slightly more than normal yield of spring wheat, would give a total crop in excess of 600,000,000 bushels, about the normal American consumption, while the needs of the allies during the coming year will be about 500,000,000 bushels. The Department urges Americans to use more corn. Reports to the department early in May indicated that the largest acreage in the history of the Union would be planted to corn, oats and potatoes, and that the crops of these would break all records.

The man problem is not yet solved. As this was written, the two Houses of Congress were deadlocked in conference over the draft bill, being unable to agree upon the age limits for drafting, while the House showed no inclination to accept the Senate's amendment, which would permit the raising of the Roosevelt division. Pending final agreement upon this bill, however, the War Department carefully prepared plans for the carrying out of selective conscription within ten days after the President's approval of the final bill. It was announced that "all persons within the age limits will be required to present themselves for registration at the customary voting places in the voting precincts in which they have their permanent home, on a day which the President will announce." The governor of each state will be the chief of registration in that state; the registration in each county will be in charge of the sheriff, the county clerk and the county physician. In cities containing a population of 30,000 or more, the registration will be under the control of the mayor and selected boards of registration. The officials designated above will appoint registrars for each voting precinct. It is expected thus to secure complete registration of all men liable to service on one day, and to have the first 500,000 men of the new army ready to be sent to training camps as soon as the three months' training period for officers, which will begin May 1, has been completed. The first army organized under the selective draft bill will consist of 18,538 officers and 528,659 enlisted men, making eighteen war-strength divisions and sixteen regiments of heavy field artillery.

The equipment of these men is another problem, and it was suggested in Congress on May 7 that the men sent abroad might be equipped with the Enfield rifle now being used by England because it was thought to be impossible on account of lack of gauges to manufacture a sufficient number of Springfield rifles in time. It was announced on May 7 that the first American troops to go to France would be nine regiments of army engineers, which would be organized and sent to France as quickly as possible for railroad work along the lines of military communication. It was expected that these regiments would be recruited from American railway men and engineering graduates, and, because of the special nature of the work expected to be required of them, that there would be no necessity for holding them in this country for military drill.

On May 3, the United States government took into its own hands all fiscal arrangements to be made in this country for the Allies, displacing the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., which had been the Allied fiscal agent since the beginning of the war. It is stated that this action will save the Allied governments several millions of dollars now being paid in commissions and in prices higher than the United States government would need to pay.

Subscriptions to the "Liberty Loan" have poured into Washington at a rate which would seem to indicate a very large over-subscription, the subscriptions to May 9 having totaled $447,421,000, nearly one-fourth of the present offering, with June 15 still five weeks off. Details of the "Liberty" bond issue were made public on May 8. Because of the bookkeeping problem that would be involved, it was decided not to issue bonds of the smaller denominations, as at first contemplated. The smallest denomination will be $50. The bonds will be redeemable by the government at its option in thirty years. Payments will be permitted in instalments; the rate and number of each payments will be announced later.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on May 8 reported to the House a war tax bill which is designed to raise $1,800,000,000 in revenue. Income taxes are raised and exemption limits are lowered. Persons unmarried and not heads of families will pay on an income in excess of $1,000 per year, exemption for heads of families will be $2,000, and the rate increases from $40 on an income of $3,000 to $1,385,180 on an income of $3,000,000. Incomes already taxed for the calendar year 1916 will be assessed an additional 33⅓ per cent. on the tax paid. All tariff duties will be raised ten per cent., and all articles now on the free list will pay an import duty of ten per cent. All sales of bonds and stocks and all original issues and transfers will be taxed. Taxes on tobacco and liquors will be greatly increased. There will be an excess profits tax of eight per cent. All public utility services will pay a tax, the tax on telegraph and telephone service being at the rate of five cents a message for conversation when the charge is fifteen cents or more. There will be a tax of eight cents on each one hundred dollars' worth of life insurance issued, and taxes on other forms of insurance. Stamp taxes will be levied against all issues of bonds, debentures, certificates of indebtedness or stock issues, conveyances or deeds, leases, custom-house certificates and steamship passage tickets, costing in excess of thirty dollars. The New South as a War Asset

Frank G. Carpenter Tells of Its Wealth and Resources and Its Rapid Development—a Great Industrial and Agricultural Empire

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

IT is thirty-six hours by fast express train from Washington to New Orleans. The distance is about as great as from London to Rome, or as from Boston to Chicago, and the trip takes one through parts of the South which can do much in the furnishing of food and war supplies. I rode the whole length of Virginia, crossing the wheat and corn lands of the rich Shenandoah Valley, passing through Lynchburg, the great tobacco market, and striking my first big cotton mills at Danville on the border of North Carolina. From there on for a distance as great as from New York to Cleveland we were in sight of cotton mills, many of which are making supplies for the soldiers.

In going through North Carolina we stopped at Highpoint, the Grand Rapids of the South. It has seventy furniture factories, and its beds, chairs and tables are now sold all over the Union. It also makes street cars for Washington, New York City and other large towns of the North. Farther south we saw cottonseed oil mills, and at Atlanta passed through an industrial beehive which reminds one of the big cities of the Middle West. Everywhere the new South is in evidence. Its industries are rapidly growing. It is already making about $4,000,000,000 of goods every year, or more than $500 per annum for every family, colored and white, which lives south of Mason and Dixon's line.

THE cry sent out for more food is affecting the crops of this year. We saw patches of corn, peas and beans here and there along the line, and gardens are being planted as never before. Near Atlanta we passed through the enormous peach orchards of Georgia, which are now annually sending millions of barrels of fruit to the North.

The farm scenes are different from those of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. There are no large barns nor outbuildings. There are no hay stacks and no silos. There are no fences of either rail or wire, and but few cattle, sheep, horses or hogs are to be seen.

Leaving Atlanta, we went downhill almost all the way to the Gulf of Mexico. We passed through Alabama, whose coal, iron and steel will form one of Uncle Sam's big assets in making guns, armor plate and similar war supplies. Farther south the corn is well up through the ground, and here at New Orleans the sugar cane is high, and we are on the edge of the summer. Everywhere the South is alive. Most of the cotton mills are now running both day and night. Both manufacturers and farmers have been spurred on by the demands of the war, and more business is being done than ever before.

But let me give you a bird's-eye view of what Uncle Sam has in the South. It makes one feel confident as to our success when we count up our assets and learn what they are. The Southern states number sixteen, and comprise some of the largest states of the Union. Bunch them together and you have an area which equals one-third of the United States proper, or more than one-fourth of all the land under Uncle Sam's flag, including Alaska, Hawaii, the Philippines and our West India Islands, with those we have just bought from Denmark thrown in. Take out Russia and the South is greater than all the countries which are now warring in Europe.

The Mississippi, the State Cotton Warehouse and New Orleans as seen from the top of the State's big elevator

Just before coming South I talked with Mr. Bradford Knapp, who has charge of the demonstration farm work now going on in the South. He tells me that our salvation lies in this region, and that with diversified farming it may be made so to increase the size of our bread and meat baskets as to greatly relieve the present high prices and supply what we need for our armies and allies.

As it is, the South itself has thirty-five million stomachs to fill. Today it is buying a great part of its supplies from the North. It can easily raise all its own food, and have vast quantities to export all over the world. Not long ago it was producing nothing but cotton, and it is only lately that it has begun to grow corn, wheat, oats and hay. Nevertheless, its total grain crop of last year was worth more than $1,200,000,000. This included only corn, wheat and oats, and it raised in addition rice worth more than $40,000,000. In 1915 the South harvested more than one-third of the corn crop of the United States, and it has the record of having produced the most corn ever raised on any one acre. That acre was farmed by a boy, and the product was 259 bushels.

AND now as to the meat! When the South has developed its livestock possibilities, Uncle Sam will not have to go to Australia for his mutton, nor to Argentina and Uruguay for his beef. In 1916 the livestock of the South was worth more than a billion dollars, and with the present demands it will greatly increase.

The South is fast becoming the winter garden of our biggest cities and towns. It is now receiving more than $500,000,000 a year from fruit and vegetables, and a vast trucking industry has grown up along the coastal plain, all the way from Chesapeake Bay to the bottom of Florida, and along the shores of the Gulf as far south as the Mexican border.

The South has enormous manufacturing possibilities. It has more coal than Germany, Great Britain, Austria, Russia or France. It has more than ten billion tons of iron yet to be mined, and it is now annually producing about forty million tons of pig iron, or more than one-half of all the pig iron made by the world. It is mining about one-half of all the coal of the world, and its coal resources have barely been touched.

The richest oil fields of the world are now in the South. Those of Oklahoma, Texas and Louisiana are already producing one-third of the oil of the world, and new fields are being opened in Louisiana and Texas, along the Mexican Gulf from Houston to Galveston. Port Arthur, on that coast, is a great oil spigot, into which rivers of petroleum from four or five states are now pouring, and the output from there goes in tank steamers to Europe, Asia and Africa.

The South of the future will bulk large in furnishing the goods we have lacked on account of the great war. In the past six months a town of 5,000 people has grown up at Kingsport, Tenn., which is making dyes of coal tar.

The South has vast phosphate mines, and it has waterpowers which will enable us to get nitrogen from the air, as they are now doing in Europe. As to sulphur, we have some of the largest deposits of the world, lying under the swamps within a few hours' ride of New Orleans, and another great sulphur bed has recently been discovered at Freeport, in Texas, so near the Gulf that the sulphur can be taken from the mines almost direct to the vessels.

LITTLE shipyards are already springing up along the Gulf coast. There are several in western Louisiana. At Orange, eighteen miles east of Beaumont, an Italian named Paggio is building a fleet of five-masted ocean sailing vessels. At Slidell, near New Orleans, they have started to build ocean vessels, and others are being constructed on the Natchez River, which will find their way out to the harbor of Port Arthur. At Lake Charles, La., they are building ocean-going barges which have gasoline engines and sails. Farther north, along the south Atlantic coast, some shipbuilding is going on, and that in addition to the great plants at Newport News and at Baltimore. One of the largest shipping yards of the United States is now being constructed at Sparrows Point, Md. by the Bethlehem Steel Company.

The South now has one-third of all our railroads, and its lines are making more money than those of any other part of the Union. Its waterfalls have more than five millions of undeveloped horsepower, and it has one place on the Tennessee River which can furnish more energy than Niagara. The Southern banks now have deposits of more than $3,000,000,000, and the people are taking a large part of the bonds issued to finance the war.

STAND with me on the roof of the huge elevator which the state of Louisiana is building at the end of the grain chute of the Mississippi Valley, and take a look at New Orleans and what it is doing along the lines of industrial preparedness. Of all the cities of the United States, there is none more awake to the needs of today. There is none which has a broader view of the possibilities of the future and none that has gone farther along the lines which shall develop its industries and make it a safe port for handling the national business.

New Orleans of today extends for miles back from the river, which here runs in a great crescent about the heart of the city. The buildings cover almost as much ground as Chicago. They are spread out over a great flat plain, the most of them lying between the river and Lake Pontchartrain. Today New Orleans is like the city founded upon a rock. It is "bone dry" as far as the ground upon which it stands is concerned. Its people have an immense drainage system, consisting of more than fifty miles of main low-level canals, into which the water runs from a network of tiles so distributed that a four-inch rainfall, such as would drown most other cities, disappears almost as soon as it drops. The level of the city is such that the water has to be pumped out of the canals into other high-level canals, which carry it off into Lake Pontchartrain. There are twenty miles of such canals, and there are seven great pumping stations which lift the water up into them. When the additional pumps now being constructed are installed, the total drainage capacity will be more than seven billion gallons per day.

The sewerage system is entirely separate from the drainage system. The new city waterworks are equally wonderful. The water mains are 547 miles long and the consumption of water is more than 20,000,000 gallons a day. These three systems of water, drainage and sewerage have cost just about $30,000,000, but they have cut down the death rate from more than twenty-seven per thousand to less than twenty per thousand. The death rate of whites is only thirteen or fourteen per thousand.

THE state and municipal projects mean much in these times of war and industrial efficiency. The elevator on which we are standing covers some acres, and the roof is 200 feet above the ground. It is being erected in units, and will have a capacity of more than two and one-half million bushels of grain. The elevator is equipped for barges and can already swallow grain at the rate of 6,000 bushels per hour. The grain is carried into the elevator and dropped into mighty storage bins, from which it goes on endless belts into the holds of the steamers. Everything is done automatically. The elevator is a state institution. It is not intended for profit, and the handling is charged for at a minimum rate.

Even more interesting than the grain elevator is the cotton warehouse which adjoins it. This warehouse was erected by the state of Louisiana in order that cotton may be shipped to better advantage from New Orleans than from any other port. The building has something like twenty acres under roof.

ABOUT one-half the cotton of the United States is now raised in the country tributary to New Orleans, and this warehouse means a great increase in the amount of shipping that will come to the port. As it is, New Orleans has a commerce of about seven million tons per annum, and it is only surpassed by New York in the amount of its incoming and outgoing shipping.

God's Shields

SUNDAY, May 27. Ps. 47 : 9. "The shields of the earth belong unto God." And God supplies these shields to his children. The shields are in his armory, and they are at the disposal of any soul which sends forth a prayerful cry of need. There are subtle enemies on the road. They lie in ambush. They take us unawares. They are especially vigilant in the season when we are most easily attacked. They watch for the unguarded moments when we stand at ease. They follow us into the times when we are on furlough, when we have laid aside some defensive duty, or when we have left the sanative ministry of common toil. And they are maliciously watchful in those days when the air is soft, and genial, and balmy, and there is nothing to remind us that any hostile presence may ever lurk beside our road. And so we have constant need of the shields of God.

And here is one of them—a healthy sense of the hideousness of sin. That is one of the greatest shields of the soul. Cardinal Newman wrote, in one of his devotional letters, "It is a great security against sin to be shocked at it." The body finds a protective in its repulsion from putrid and nauseous food. Our moral recoils are splendid securities. The patriarch Job laid his hand on one of his defenses when he said: "Cannot my palate discern perverse things?" So long as the palate retains this power of discrimination, and loathes the unclean, its very loathing is part of the armament which will safeguard it along the foulest road. Our moral repulsion is one of the shields of God.

And here is another—a healthy sense of the beauty of holiness. This sense is a correlative of the former. They may even be regarded as the two sides of the same shield. It is our likes which determine our dislikes. Our attractions always suggest our repulsions. It is a mighty defense for the soul to have a passionate love of the lovely, to go along the road eager for every sign of the King's presence, and to love his appearing. There is a very significant line in the portrayal of the character of Barnabas, which tells us that "when he saw the grace of God he was glad." When our emotions kindle at the sight of the things of grace we have a piece of splendid armor. It is one of the shields of God.

And here is a third—the assurance that God loves us. What a defense is that on the road! It gives birth to songs in the night! And then our very songs add still more to our defenses. "Thou hast compassed me about with songs of deliverance." "The joy of the Lord shall be your strength." All these are typical shields, and we are not left to construct them in the dim light of our own ignorance. These shields belong unto God, and they are the gifts of his grace. J. H. J.

"Ye Are Dead"

MONDAY, May 28. Col. 3 : 3. "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." There is a sense in which every true Christian is dead even while he lives. We speak of one as being blind to opportunity, even though he may have very good eyes. It is sometimes said that one is deaf to persuasion, even though his physical hearing may be perfect. A promoter who had vainly endeavored to interest a wealthy man in some enterprise reported, "I might as well have been talking to a dead man." The fact is the man was dead so far as that particular proposition was concerned.

We are quite justified in saying that Jesus, in the days of his flesh, was dead to certain ends and aims of life, such as desire for fame or power, or greed for gold, or unworthy ambition of any kind. The ends for which many of us live had no more power over him than if he had been actually dead. So the apostle says, "It is a faithful saying, For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him."

Some things must die in us in order that other things may live. The life of the spirit is maintained by "pride deposed and passion slain." The secret of new life in Christ is in the death of self. "I am crucified with Christ, . . . nevertheless I live."

The Faith of the Farmer

TUESDAY, May 29. Haggai 1 : 9. "Ye looked for much, and, lo, it came to little; and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it. Why? saith the Lord of hosts. Because of mine house that is waste, and ye run every man unto his own house." Among the toilers of the earth no one is more directly dependent upon the providence of God than the farmer. All his plowing and planting, sowing and tilling is lost labor, if heaven does not send him fruitful seasons. He must patiently wait for the early rain and the latter rain. God must temper the wind for his growing and ripening crops. This is such a plain fact that we imagine no husbandman could fail to recognize it. In rural districts, therefore, piety should be the rule. Where every task preaches trust in the Lord, we imagine religion should be in a most flourishing condition. But there is forgetfulness of God also among country people. Sometimes a farmer will think more readily of enlarging his barns and building a fine country home and acquiring the most modern implements of agriculture than of repairing the old dilapidated church in which he worships. Then the Lord begins to teach the forgetful farmer a lesson. The lesson comes in the form of a twofold disappointment: the crops do not turn out according to expectations. Instead of twenty bushels the acre yields but ten. Also in the preservation of his garnered crops the farmer may experience difficulties. There is unlooked for waste: the grain does not keep, the potatoes go to waste. Not only the individual farmer, however, whose heart has not been right with God, but the entire nation, also the dwellers in the cities, who are always dependent upon the products of the field, should learn a lesson here. When the kingdom of God and his righteousness ceases to be a matter of serious concern to men, God sends them droughts and famines to rouse them out of their worldliness. When men forget God and his church, they are preparing for hard times. W. H. T. D.

The Heroism of Esther

WEDNESDAY, May 30. Esther 4 : 16. "If I perish, I perish." When the Jewish nation was in peril, owing to the wicked Haman's hatred of Mordecai, Esther exhibited the spirit of a true heroine, daring death in being willing to go before King Ahasuerus. At first, Esther seemed only a beautiful maiden who had won the admiration of the monarch after the banishment of Vashti. When Mordecai knew that the king's edict had gone forth, his only human hope was in his great niece Esther. He believed that she had come to the kingdom providentially for this momentous hour. The very loveliness of her face seemed God-given to solve the problem of danger.

There was a law in her way that she was not to go before the king unless invited; it meant death to disregard this rule. Esther commanded that her people should observe fasting and prayer for three days, when she said she would go before the king, and "if I perish, I perish." Hers was the true spirit of patriotism, of martyrdom, giving herself for her countrymen. True, she believed that her God was able to deliver, and she may have had the assurance in her heart that he would do so. "But if not, if I die; I die as the coming Messiah will die for all mankind."

Esther won the favor of the king, and saved her own life and that of all the Jews in the Persian realm. This noble woman lives today in the memory of the Jewish people, in the observance of the feast of Purim, which commemorates the great deliverance. Is not hers an inspiring sentiment for every one in hours of danger; when the lives of others are at stake, when a whole nation is in peril?—"if I perish, I perish."

"Let the Others Do the Work"

THURSDAY, May 31. John 21 : 8. "And the other disciples came in a little ship; . . . dragging the net with fishes." In his great anxiety to see Jesus, Peter had leaped into the sea to swim and wade ashore. If the other six fishermen in the boat had been as impulsive as Peter, they would have lost all the fish they had netted. Peter had a temperament kindred to that of Mary. Martha was willing to do all the work, and Mary was willing to let her. Peter was entirely willing that the other fishermen should "tarry by the stuff" and drag the net to land.

And yet let us not be too strict in judging Peter. He had a confession to make to Jesus, which the others had no need to make. A sin was on his conscience. He had denied his Lord. Let us rather count it to his credit that Peter would rather have lost the catch and gone hungry—indeed would rather have lost the boat, tackle and all, than to have missed the opportunity of swift confession and possible restoration. In the serious work of life, however, let us not fail in sympathy with those who must toil while others pray. "Other men labored, and ye are entered into their labors." It was an unusual thing to do, but it made a deep impression on some persons present in a certain church service when the minister, in praying for those who led the congregation in song, the organist, chorister and singers, prayed also for the man who, back of the curtain, was pumping the organ. The official report of a great naval battle included a paragraph in which tribute was paid to the stokers. When we lie down at night in a Pullman berth, let us have a kindly thought and a prayer for the men who must be awake all night, in the engine cab, in the signal tower, at the switch, walking the tracks. Peter is spectacular, but the other disciples are indispensable; they man the boat and drag the net to land.

Spiritual Security

FRIDAY, June 1. 1 Cor. 10 : 12. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." Signal blessings which have been vouchsafed us in our spiritual life may beget a tendency to spiritual security. There are people who are at ease in Zion. They have been favored by having the Word of God ministered to them for many years. They have been regular in their attendance upon the ordinances of the Lord's house. Their religious life has gone on without any great disturbances. They bask in the sunshine of the loving kindness of God. Then a mellow feeling of complacent ease comes over them. They forget that Christian life is a constant warfare with the devil, the world, and the flesh. They become self-indulgent. Suddenly there occurs a grievous fall from grace.

What a favored lot was that of the children of Israel at the time of the exodus from Egypt and immediately thereafter! God had brought them out of the house of their bondage with his mighty arm, had led them dry-shod through the sea, had been their guide by the cloudy and fiery pillar day and night, and had manifested his glory to them at Sinai. They were the marvel of the nations through whom they passed. The terror of Jehovah who was with Israel fell upon the pagans.

Yet it was in the midst of this people, who were singled out for divine favors from the rest of mankind, that such gross wickedness as open idolatry, even at the foot of the mountain of legislation, and shameless lewdness occurred. God had to send the destroyer among them; three and twenty thousand fell in one day. It took the poison of reptiles raging in their veins to teach them that their hearts were still in nature truant and treacherous. They thought they were standing, but they fell.

Every favor that God shows us should make us more keenly alive to the corruption that is still within us, more careful of our daily conduct, more diligent seekers after the grace of God, which has [made us Christians, and which is the only power that can keep us in the adoption of sons. Spiritual security is spiritual decay. As in the camp of Israel the cross of Christ was erected to reclaim men from their ruin, so it should be erected in all our devotions.

The Presence of Christ

SATURDAY, June 2. Ex. 33 : 15. "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence." God said to Moses in that wonderful interview on the mountain, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest; thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name." What an awful calamity if the Heavenly Father should forget to accompany his child! It is well for us if we can see the pillar of cloud and fire and feel the consciousness of the Holy Spirit until our hearts burn within us. If we have faith in the promised word, "I will never leave thee," then we unload our burdens on the divine shoulders, finding rest in Jesus. It is not God's omnipresence but his personal presence we desire. It is Christ in you that you prize.

Anywhere in the universe is your home, for God is there. The most untoward circumstance or calamity does not ripple your tranquillity, for the peace of God is yours, and all the forces of nature and of the Godhead are marshaled to defend you.

O blessed Presence divine! How precious thou art to the soul! All thy goodness and mercy are ours. All thy victories over death, hell and the grave belong to thy children. Thou dost place us on the bright side of every cloud with thyself, whispering softly, "All mine are thine, and thou art mine always."

If we learn to practice the presence of God we shall often dwell in heavenly places in Christ while yet in this world, and at the end of the journey we shall know that in God's presence is fulness of joy forever more.

Love's fires burn brightly when fed with the fagots of thoughtfulness and the fine coals of self-denial.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

A Trip of Triumph. The French commission, headed by former Premier René Viviani, Marshal Joffre and Admiral Chocheprat, left Washington on May 4 going to Chicago, Springfield, Ill., Kansas City and St. Louis, and returning east visited Philadelphia, New York and Boston, being joined at New York by Mr. Balfour, and meeting there also Enrico Arlotta and five others of the Italian Commission who reached America May 10. Everywhere the representatives of the French republic, especially the victor of the Marne, received enthusiastic welcome, were dined and fêted, toasted and addressed and presented with various souvenirs as tokens of American regard. At Philadelphia, in the historic Independence Hall, M. Viviani said: "We do not feel in America as if we are far from home. The ideals and aims of America and of France are the same. It was in this holy place that freedom was first breathed through the mouths of men for the inspiration of every nation." The party arrived in New York May 9.

First American Detachment to France. The first unit of the United States army to carry the flag of the free into the battle on the western front will be a detachment of the medical corps, numbering, with surgeons, nurses, clerks, hospital attendants and stretcher-bearers, 240 persons, who sailed from New York during the first week in May. The second unit of 250 members was mobilized in Boston to follow the first within a few weeks.

Balfour and Lansing Confer. Foreign Secretary Balfour and Sir Eric Drummond of the British War Mission spent the first week-end in May with Secretary Lansing at Gunston Hall in Virginia, in a quiet conference intended to sum up the work of the mission to that date and to lay plans for work remaining to be done. It was announced that the first formal meetings of the British and American representatives had resulted in the appointment of a group of sub-committees which were to discuss an American expeditionary force to France, material, intelligence, munitions, hospitals, shipping, the Allies' needs in imports, and American resources.

Railway Commission to Russia. On May 9 the United States Railroad Commission to the Russian government left Washington for Petrograd. The commission will carry assurance to Russia of the purpose of America to furnish rolling stock and other material needed for the Russian and Siberian railroads, and will assist the Russian government in the organization of transportation. The commission consists of John F. Stevens of New York, former chief engineer of the Panama Canal, chairman, W. L. Garland of St. Paul, Henry Miller of St. Louis, George Gibbs of Philadelphia, and J. P. Griner of Baltimore, all operating officials of American railroads.

American Admiral in Allied Council. Rear Admiral William S. Sims, U. S. N., represented the United States at an important war conference of the Allies held in Paris early in May. Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig, David Lloyd George, M. Ribot, Generals Petain and Nivelle, Vice Admiral de Bon and the Italian and Russian ambassadors were parties to the conference. It is said that Rear Admiral Sims will direct the operation of American naval forces on the European side of the Atlantic in order to avoid the delay incident to direction from Washington.

Marshal Joffre at the salute. Wherever he went in New York, the Tricolor or the acclaim of cheering thousands brought the old soldier's hand to the salute

Repairing Seized Ships. It was announced on May 5 that the most seriously damaged of the seized German merchant ships would be ready for use in four months. Three of the ships on that date had been completely repaired and put in commission, while three others were to be ready for commission by the middle of May. The first two put in commission were loaned to the French and Italian governments for one round trip. It was announced that three of the larger vessels, the President Lincoln, the President Grant and the Pennsylvania, had been so extensively damaged that the repairs to each would cost in the neighborhood of $250,000. The German commerce-raiders Kronprinz Wilhelm and Prinz Eitel Friedrich have been renamed Baron von Steuben and Baron de Kalb, after two Germans who fought with the Continental Army in the Revolutionary War. The House on May 7 adopted a joint resolution already passed by the Senate authorizing the President to put in service vessels of the enemy in American ports. On May 9 it was announced that the Federal Shipping Board had purchased from American owners seven former Austrian merchantmen held in American ports, totaling 52,621 tons, at a price of $6,778,006, which was said to represent the cost of the vessels to the owner. Great Britain has arranged with Portugal for the lease of sixty of the seventy-six German merchant steamers seized by Portugal when she entered the war. It is understood that England is to pay Portugal a rental of $7,000,000 a year.

Railways Fight for Increase. The shippers having been heard, and having been shown somewhat in disagreement as to the justice of increased freight rates, the railways themselves were heard on May 7 before the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was shown that the fifteen per cent. increase in freight rates asked for, although it would yield $300,000,000 to $400,000,000, would fail by $75,000,000 to offset the increase in operating expenses for the current year.

The Nation's Money for Relief. The American government on May 9 assumed the immediate financial burden of Belgian relief, arranging to lend the French and Belgian governments jointly $75,000,000, to be expended by the American Belgian Relief Commission, the money to be advanced in monthly instalments of $7,500,000 to Belgium and $5,000,000 to France. This will relieve the British and French governments of the contributions they have been making to Belgian relief. American contributions, which have lately been reaching a total of $1,000,000 a month to Belgian relief, will be retained to form a special reserve fund for reconstruction work and the care of orphan children in Belgium after peace has been declared, unless emergencies arise to demand other uses of these funds.

Federal Council Plans War Program. A meeting of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America in session in Washington on May 8 announced that a program of action for the Protestant churches of the United States had been formulated, which would include national prohibition as a war measure, practical economy by individual families, cooperation of churches with the Red Cross in war relief, a declaration against lowering labor standards under war stress, cooperation of all churches through the Federal Council with the War and Navy Departments to supply efficient ministers as chaplains and action by churches and Y. M. C. A. to promote a moral and religious atmosphere about the new army.

The Personnel of the Russian Commission. The names of the men who will make up the United States mission to Russia were announced by the State Department on May 11 as follows: Elihu Root, New York; Charles R. Crane, Illinois; John R. Mott, New York; Cyrus McCormick, Illinois; Samuel R. Bertron, New York; James Duncan, Massachusetts; Charles E. Russell, New York; Major-General Hugh L. Scott, U. S. A.; Rear-Admiral James H. Glennon, U. S. N. Mr. Russell is said to be a pronounced Socialist.

Fragments of News. Secretary Baker on May 5 announced the appointment of Raymond B. Fosdick of New York as chairman of a commission to stimulate the development of recreational facilities in the camps and communities adjoining them and to advise with him on the problem of checking the moral hazards frequently associated with camp life. . . . STOP WHEAT SPECULATION. With the price of wheat for May delivery at $3.25 a bushel and a combination of legitimate demand and speculation forcing it higher, the directors of the Board of Trade of Chicago on May 11 discontinued all trading in May wheat. Existing contracts were settled at $3.18. The trading continued in wheat for July and September delivery, prices on May 12 reaching $2.75 and $2.46 a bushel respectively. The Department of Agriculture has demanded government action against "food gamblers." The Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Russian situation still continues to be the most important single phase of the war. This is not only because Russia by her geographical position is able to apply pressure on the eastern boundaries of the Central Empires, but because of her enormous man power, and also because of the influence on the general course of events her agricultural and other raw-product resources would have if they were placed at the disposal of the Teutons.

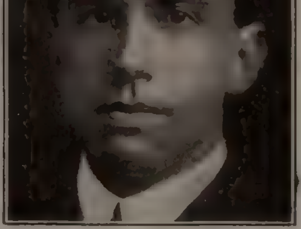
Who will assist Russia to solve railway problems



Raymond B. Fosdick
Who will help keep camps morally clean

Whether or not the overthrow of such government as now exists in Russia and the substitution therefor of some more advanced government will lead to a formal peace with Russia's enemies, is a more or less academic question, since at the present time Russia's army, industrial forces, economic resources and financial conditions are all disorganized, and the constant political agitations tend toward an even greater state of disorganization, which means impotency as far as warfare is concerned.

About the middle of the week, in the hope of easing the tension between it and the workingmen's councils, the provisional government proclaimed that it was ready and willing to form a coalition ministry and to admit thereto a far greater number of representatives of the socialists, the advanced radicals, etc. But this proposition has aroused the anger of the soldiers and workmen's councils, who under the leadership of the council of Moscow have called a national congress of these councils to meet at once and to take such measures as may be deemed necessary to control the government.

In the middle of the week some of the bitterest fighting of the war centered around the village of Fresnoy.

Fresnoy lies about five miles north of the river Scarpe, and about four miles directly to the east of Vimy village, Lens itself being about five miles to the northwest, and its capture the other day by the Canadians was asserted by the British to be a breach of the so-called Hindenburg line.

On Tuesday, May 8, the Germans made a fierce counter-attack on the Canadians in possession of the town, and in their first assault succeeded in gaining a foothold in their opponents' trenches northeast of the village. But the Canadians succeeded in ejecting the Teutons from their trenches almost completely.

A little later in the day the Germans made a fresh attack, two divisions strong, according to the British account. This attack was successfully resisted on the northern portion of the battle front by the Canadians, but on the southern half their line gave way and the Germans recaptured the village of Fresnoy and the wood of the same name. The Germans took 200 prisoners and a few machine guns with the village.

From Tuesday on until the close of this review the fighting around Fresnoy was terrific, the British making desperate efforts to recover the place, while the Germans resisted with equal ardor. The week closed with Fresnoy in their hands.

South of the Scarpe there has been an almost unceasing battle between the British and Teutons for the possession of the village of Bullecourt, located about half way between Croiselle and Riencourt. The importance of this village lies in the fact that it also is said to be in the Hindenburg line and its capture by the British would enable them to straighten their line south of the Scarpe and eliminate a salient. At the end of the week, the British had the best of it and had taken the western half of the place.

On the southern part of the active line, the French made a tremendous and successful attack upon the German positions along the Chemin des Dames, the road running parallel with the Aisne River and a few miles north thereof from Laffaux to Craonne. This assault lasted for two days, and when ended the Germans had been driven not only from all their positions south of this road, but several of their strongholds to the north of the road had passed into the hands of the French, notably Cerny and Craonne, and besides the French took some 6,500 prisoners and a considerable quantity of artillery and munitions of war.

On the following days violent German counter attacks halted the French.

The official bulletin of the British submarine losses in the zone surrounding the British Isles for the week ending last Sunday was published May 9 and shows 24 vessels of over 1,600 tons sunk as against 38 the week before; vessels under 1,600 tons, 22, as against 13; fishing vessels and sailers, 16, as against eight. This shows a decrease as regards the larger vessels and increase as regards the smaller. The Germans claim that 1,100,000 tons of shipping were sunk by them in April.

Very heavy fighting took place on the Macedonian front on Thursday and Friday of this week.

The Allies, after strong artillery preparation, attacked their opponents' positions in the Cerna bend, on a front about ten miles in length.

In the Lake Doiran region, the British also attacked. Their left wing took Teutonic trenches on a front of two miles, while the right occupied about a mile of their opponents' positions.

All Aboard for the Head Hunters

YOU'D like to go to the Philippines, wouldn't you? Ever since Uncle Sam paid two dollars apiece for 10,000,000, more or less savages and started to civilize them, you've had a sort of a hankering to see the country. Maynard Owen Williams in next week's Christian Herald is going to continue his story about the Igorotes of Baguio. There are some mighty fine pictures with the story.

Some of you have wondered, too, how mission schools got along in war times. Eveline A. Thomson, for ten years in the American College for Women in Constantinople, has contributed a vividly striking story of feminine courage and optimism in "Running a College in War Time."

Then, there will be a timely missionary message from Bishop Frank W. Warne of India, and a comprehensive review of Mr. H. G. Wells' new book, now creating a tremendous stir among religious people, "God, the Invisible King."

The week following there will be an intimate story of Zapata by Edward S. O'Reilly, whose personal story of Villa was recently given to the Christian Herald readers.

be taxed. Automobiles, automobile trucks, motorcycles and tires will pay a tax of five per cent. on the price for which they are sold. Phonographs, records, moving picture films, motor-boats, sporting goods of all kinds, perfume and toilet articles, tea and coffee, will all pay an appropriate tax.

Perhaps the most radical paragraph in the whole bill is the one proposing an increase in the postage rates, by which it is planned to increase the first class postage rate by one cent an ounce, and the second-class postage rate from the present rate of one cent a pound to a rate varying from two to six cents by a zone system. This provision, if it becomes a law, would probably result in an average rate, for publications having a national circulation, of four cents a pound as against the present rate of one cent, or an increase of 300 per cent. "Newspapers and periodicals maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor or fraternal organizations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which is used to benefit any private stockholder or individual," are granted continuance of the present rate. This bill may be modified in many respects before its passage.

Under the proposed bill, Americans would be taxed at a rate of about thirty-three dollars per capita, which is said to be a little more than half the per capita taxation in Great Britain at present.

The bill was reported to the House on May 9 and discussed in the House on May 10, 11 and 12, while the Senate, as a measure of saving time, conducted hearings on certain sections of the bill. Representative Claude Kitchin, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, opened the debate in the House, speaking for nearly five hours. On the following day Representative Joseph W. Fordney, ranking Republican of the same committee, discussed the bill. Both speakers took occasion to congratulate the country on the absolute lack of partisanship or attempt to secure sectional advantage which had marked the discussion of the bill in committee. Both speakers admitted that the bill was inequitable in some of its provisions and that it could only be justified on the basis of war necessity. Other members attacked various sections of the bill, one section that drew fire particularly being the zone system in the proposed new rates on second-class mail matter.

Secretary Daniels on May 8 was reported as admitting that the American navy was in possession of a promising plan for overcoming the submarine menace. An Inventions Board working under the Council of National Defense is said to have made experiments which warranted a hopeful view of the situation. In the meantime, plans are going forward rapidly for the creation of a merchant marine to replace tonnage sunk by submarines. It was announced in Washington on May 8 that Congress would be asked to appropriate $1,000,000,000 for the building of a great American merchant fleet. The plan was said to include the practical taking over by the government of the entire steel industry of the country, canceling all private contracts for all steel manufactures, except that absolutely necessary to the railroads of the country. It is expected that by this mobilization of the steel industry and by the use of every available mechanic in the construction of both wooden and steel vessels, between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 tons of shipping will be constructed during the next two years.

The deadlock between the Senate and House over the draft bill was ended on May 10 and the conference reported a compromise bill to the two houses of Congress. The age limits for the draft were fixed at from twenty-one to thirty years inclusive. Substantial increases in the pay of enlisted men were provided, to become effective June 1, and a provision was inserted making enlistments in the National Guard and Regular Army run for the duration of the present emergency. The Senate's provision for the raising of volunteer divisions was dropped from the bill, but the house, on May 12, voted 215 to 178 to authorize volunteer divisions and returned the bill to conference. The rate of enlistment continued to increase after May 5. On the 10th of May, 2,105 men were accepted for the army, making a total since April 1 of 63,385 men, while on the same date there had been enlisted in the navy 21,341, bringing the total of the enlisted strength of the navy to 95,028.

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, orphan daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement, and a month later a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once his father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first two months of the honeymoon were spent in finding a home and trying to live in a flat on $15 a week. This problem was soon solved to Helen's satisfaction by means of an account at the grocery, which she opened without Burke's knowledge. The explosion came with the first batch of grocer's bills. Burke then instructed Helen in the mysteries of bookkeeping, and at the same time tried to polish the manners of his rustic wife. One evening Burke received a visit from his friend Dr. Gleason, a traveler and archeologist, and Helen did her best to entertain their guest; but her efforts only served to mortify her husband and accentuate the gulf that separated her from the refined society in which he had been reared. The same thing happened when Burke, in response to an invitation from his father, took his wife to visit the Denby mansion.

CHAPTER IX—Continued

A Bottle of Ink

IT was perhaps a month later that another invitation to dinner came from John Denby. This time Burke did not stutter out a joyous, incoherent acceptance. He declined so promptly and emphatically that he quite forgot his manners for the moment, and had to attach to the end of his refusal a hurried and ineffectual "Er—thank you; you are very kind, I'm sure!" He looked up then and met his father's eyes. But instantly his gaze dropped.

"Er—ah—Helen is not well at all, dad," he still further added, nervously. "Of course I'll speak to her. But I don't think we can come."

There was a moment's pause. Then, very gravely, John Denby said: "Oh, I am sorry, son."

Burke, with a sudden tightening of his throat, turned and walked away.

"He didn't laugh, he didn't sneer, he didn't look anyhow, only just plain sorry," choked the young man to himself. "And he had such a magnificent chance to do—all of them. But he just—understood."

Burke "spoke to Helen" that night.

"Father asked us to dinner next Sunday; but—I said I didn't think we could go. I told him you weren't feeling well. I didn't think you'd want to go; and—I didn't want to go myself."

Helen frowned and pouted.

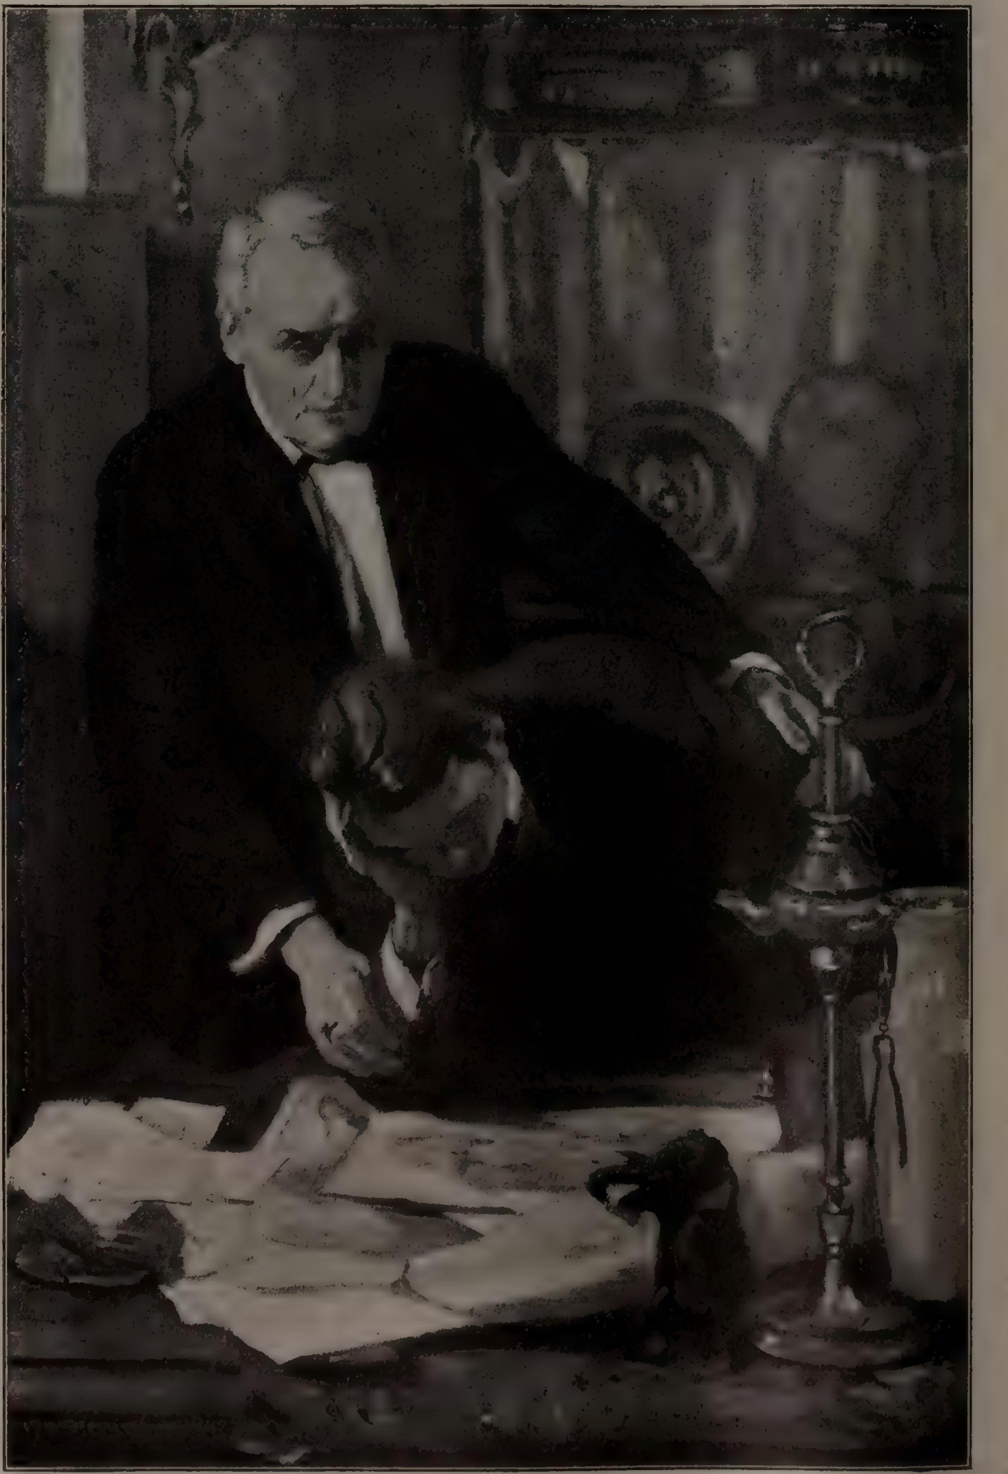
"Well, I've got my opinion of folks who refuse an invitation without even asking 'em if they want to go," she bridled. "Not that I mind much, in this case, though,—if it's just a dinner. I thought once, maybe he meant something—that he was giving in, you know. But I haven't seen any signs of that. And as for just going to dinner—I can't say I am specially anxious for that—mean as I feel now."

"No, I thought not," said Burke.

And there the matter ended. As the summer passed Burke fell into the way of going often to see his father, though never at meal-time. He went alone. Helen said she did not care to go, and that she did not see what fun Burke could find in it, anyway.

To Burke, these hours that he spent with his father chatting and smoking in the dim old library, or on the vine-shaded veranda, were like a breeze blowing across the desert of existence—like water in a thirsty land. From day to day he planned for these visits. From hour to hour he lived upon them.

To all appearances John Denby and his son had picked up their old comradeship exactly where the marriage had severed it. Even to Burke's watchful, sensitive eyes the "wall" seemed quite gone. There was, however, one difference: mother was never mentioned. John Denby never spoke of her now.



John Denby went straight to his son and laid both hands on his shoulders

There was plenty to talk about. There were all the old interests, and there was business. Burke was giving himself heart and soul to business these days. In July he won another promotion, and was given an advance in wages. Often, to Burke's infinite joy, his father consulted him about matters and things quite beyond his nominal position, and showed in other ways his approval of his son's progress. Helen, the marriage, and the Dale Street home life were never mentioned—for which Burke was thankful.

"He couldn't say anything I'd want to hear," said Burke to himself, at times. "And I—I can't say anything he wants to hear. Best forget it—if we can."

To "forget it" seemed, indeed, in these days, to be Burke's aim and effort. Always had Burke tried to forget things. From the day his six-months-old fingers had flung the offending rattle behind him had Burke endeavored to thrust out of sight and mind everything that annoyed—and Helen and marriage had become very annoying. Systematically, therefore, he was trying to forget them. His attitude, indeed, was not unlike that of a small boy who, weary of his game of marbles, cries, "Oh, come, let's play something else. I'm tired of this!"—an attitude which, naturally, was not conducive to happiness, either for himself or for any one else—particularly as the game he was playing was marriage, not marbles.

The summer passed and October came. Life at the Dale Street flat had settled into a monotony of discontent and dreariness. Helen, discouraged, disappointed, and far from well, dragged through the housework day by day, wishing each night that it were morning, and each morning that it were night—a state of mind scarcely conducive to happiness on her part.

For all that Burke was away so many evenings now, Helen was not so lonely as she had been in the spring; for in Mrs. Jones's place had come a new neighbor, Mrs. Cobb. And Mrs. Cobb was even brighter and more original than Mrs. Jones ever was, and Helen liked her very much. She was a mine of information as to housekeeping secrets, and she was teaching Helen how to make the soft and dainty little garments that would be needed in November. But she talked even more loudly than Mrs. Jones had talked, and her laugh was nearly always the first sound that Burke heard across the hall every morning. Moreover, she possessed a phonograph which, according to Helen, played "perfectly grand tunes"; and some one of these tunes was usually the first thing that Burke heard every night when he came home. So he called her coarse and noisy, and declared she was even worse than Mrs. Jones; whereat Helen retorted that of course he wouldn't like her, if she did—which (while possibly true) did not make him like either her or Mrs. Cobb any better.

The baby came in November. It was a little girl. Helen wanted to call her "Vivian Mabelle." She said she thought that was a swell name, and that it was the name of her favorite heroine in a perfectly grand book. But Burke objected strenuously. He declared very emphatically that no daughter of his should have to go through life tagged like a vaudeville fly-by-night.

Of course Helen cried, and of course Burke felt ashamed of himself. Helen's tears had always been a potent weapon—though, from over-use, they were fast losing a measure of their power. The first time he saw her cry, the foundations of the earth sank beneath him, and he dropped into a fathomless abyss from which he thought he would never rise. It was the same the next time, and the next. The fourth time, as he felt the now familiar sensation of sinking down, down, down, he outflung desperate hands and found an unexpected support—his temper. After that it was always with him. It helped to tinge with righteous indignation his despair, and it kept him from utterly melting into weak subserviency.

Still, even yet, he was not used to them his wife's tears. Sometimes he fled from them; sometimes he endured them in dumb despair behind set teeth; sometimes he raved and ranted in a way he was always ashamed of afterward. But still they had the power, in a measure, to make his heart like water within him.

So now, about the baby's name, he called himself a brute and a beast to bring tears to the eyes of the little mother—toward whom, since the baby's advent, he felt a remorseful tenderness. But he still maintained that he could have no man, or woman, call his daughter "Vivian Mabelle."

"But I should think you'd let me name my own baby," wailed his wife.

Burke choked back a hasty word and assumed his pet "I'll-be-patient-if-it-kills-me" air.

"And you shall name it," he soothed her. "Listen! Here are pencil and paper. Now, write down a whole lot of names that you'd like, and I'll promise to select one of them. Then you'll be naming the baby all right. See?"

Helen did not "see," quite, that she would be naming the baby; but, knowing from past experience of her husband's temper that resistance would be unpleasant, she obediently took the paper and spent some time writing down a list of names.

Burke frowned a good deal when he saw the list, and declared that it was pretty poor pickings, and that he ought to have known better than to have bound himself to a silly-fool promise like that. But he chose a name (he said he would keep his word, of course), and he selected "Dorothy Elizabeth" as being less impossible than its accompanying "Veras," "Violets," and "Clarissa Muriels."

For the first few months after the baby's advent, Burke spent much more time at home, and seemed very evidently to be trying to pay especial attention to his wife's comfort and welfare. He was proud of the baby, and declared it was the cutest little kid going. He poked it in its ribs, thrust a tentative finger into the rose-leaf of a hand (emitting a triumphant chuckle of delight when the rose-leaf became a tightly clutching little fist), and even allowed the baby to be placed one or twice in his rather reluctant and fearful arms. But, for the most part, he contented himself with merely looking at it, and asking how soon it would walk and talk, and when would it grow its teeth and hair.

Burke was feeling really quite keenly these days the solemnity and responsibility of fatherhood. He had called into being a new soul. A little life was in his hands to train. By and by this tiny pink roll of humanity would be a prattling child, a little girl, a young lady. And all the way she would be turning to him for companionship and guidance. It behooved him, indeed, to look well to himself, that he should be in all ways a fit pattern.

IT was a solemn thought. No more tempers, tantrums, and impatience. No more idle repinings and useless regrets. What mattered it if he were disillusioned and heartsick? Did he want this child of his, this beautiful daughter, to grow up in such an atmosphere? Never! At once, therefore, he must begin to cultivate patience, contentment, tranquillity, and calmness of soul. He, the pattern, must be all things that he would wish her to be.

And how delightful it would be when she was old enough to meet him on his own ground—to be a companion for him, the companion he had not found in his wife! She would be pretty, of course, sweet-tempered, and cheerful. (Was he not to train her himself?) She would be capable and sensible, too. He would see to that. To no man, in the future, should she bring the tragedy of disillusionment that her mother had brought to him. No, indeed! For that matter, however, he should not let her marry any one for a long time. He should keep her himself. Perhaps he would not let her marry at all. He did not think much of this marriage business, anyway. Not that he was going to show that feeling any longer now, of course. From now on he was to show only calm contentment and tranquillity of soul, no matter what the circumstances. Was he not a father? Had he not, in the hollow of his hand, a precious young life to train?

Again all this was very well in theory. But in practice—

Dorothy Elizabeth was not six months old before the young father discovered that parenthood changed conditions, not people. He felt just as irritated at the way Helen buttered a whole slice of bread at a time, and said "swell" and "you was," as before; just as impatient because he could not buy what he wanted; just as annoyed at a purple cushion on a red sofa.

He was surprised and disappointed. He told himself that he had supposed that when a fellow made good resolutions he was given some show of a chance to keep them. But as if any one could cultivate calm contentment and tranquillity of soul as he was situated!

First, there were not only all of his old disappointments and annoyances to contend with, but a multitude of new ones. It was as if, indeed, each particular torment had taken unto itself wife and children, so numerous had they become. There was really now no peace at home. There was nothing but the baby. He had not supposed that any one thing or person could so monopolize everything and everybody.

When the baby was awake, Helen acted as if she thought the earth swung on its axis solely to amuse it. When it slept, she seemed to think the earth ought to stand still—lest it wake Baby up. With the same wholesale tyranny she marshaled into line everything and everybody on the earth, plainly regarding nothing and no one as of consequence, except in its relationship to Baby.

SUCH unimportant things as meals and housework, in comparison with Baby, were of even less than second consequence; and Burke grew to feel himself more and more an alien and a nuisance in his own home. Moreoever, where before he had found disorder and untidiness, he now found positive chaos. And however fond he was of the Baby, he grew unutterably weary of searching for his belongings among Baby's rattles, balls, shirts, socks, milk bottles, blankets, and powder-puffs.

The "cool, calm serenity" of his determination he found it difficult to realize; and the delights and responsibilities of fatherhood began to pall upon him. It looked to be so long a way ahead, even to teeth, talking, and walking, to say nothing of the charm and companionship of a young lady daughter!

Children were all very well, of course, —very desirable. But did they never do anything but cry? Couldn't they be taught that nights were for sleep, and that other people in the house had some rights besides themselves? And must they always choose four o'clock in the morning for a fit of the colic? Helen said it was colic. For his part, he believed it was nothing more or less than temper—plain temper!

And so it went. Another winter passed, and spring came. Matters were no better, but rather worse. A series of incompetent maids had been adding considerably to the expense—and little to the comfort—of the household. Helen, as a mistress, was not a success. She understood neither her own duties nor those of the maid—which resulted in short periods of poor service and frequent changes.

July came with its stifling heat, and Dorothy Elizabeth, now twenty months old, showed a daily increasing disapproval of life in general and of her own existence in particular. Helen, worn and worried, and half sick from care and loss of sleep, grew day by day more fretful, more difficult to get along with. Burke, also half sick from loss of sleep, and consumed with a fierce, inward rebellion against everything and everybody, including himself, was no less difficult to get along with.

Of course this state of affairs could not continue forever. The tension had to snap some time. And it snapped—over a bottle of ink in a baby's hand.

It happened on Bridget's "afternoon out," when Helen was alone with the baby. Dorothy Elizabeth, propped up in her high chair beside the dining-room table, where her mother was writing a letter, reached covetous hands toward the fascinating little fat black bottle. The next instant a wild shout of glee and an inky tide surging from an upside-down bottle, held high above a golden head, told that the quest had been successful.

Things happened then very fast. There were a dismayed cry from Helen, half a-dozen angry spats on a tiny hand, a series of shrieks from Dorothy Elizabeth, and a rapidly spreading inky pall over baby, dress, table, rug, and Helen's new frock.

At that moment Burke appeared in the door.

With wrathful eyes he swept the scene before him, losing not one detail of scolding woman, shrieking child, dinnerless table, and inky chaos. Then he strode into the room.

"Well!" he snapped. "Nice restful place for a tired man to come to, isn't it? This is your idea of a happy home, I suppose!"

The overwrought wife and mother, with every nerve tingling, turned sharply.

"Oh, yes, that's right—blame me! Blame me for everything! Maybe you think I think this is a happy, restful place, too! Maybe you think this is what I thought 'twould be being married to you! But I can tell you it just isn't! Maybe you think I ain't tired of working and pinching and slaving, and never having any fun, and being scolded and blamed all the time because I don't eat and walk and stand up and sit down the way you want me to, and— Where are you goin'?" she broke off, as her husband reached for the hat he had just tossed aside, and started for the door.

Burke turned quietly. His face was very white.

"I'm going down to the square to get something to eat. Then I'm going up to father's. And—you needn't sit up for me. I shall stay all night."

"All—night!"

"Yes. I'd like to sleep—for once. And that's what I can't do—here." The next moment the door had banged behind him.

Helen, left alone with the baby, fell back limply.

"Why, Baby, he—he—" Then she caught the little ink-stained figure to her and began to cry convulsively.

In the street outside Burke strode along with his head high and his jaw sternly set. He was very angry. He told himself that he had a right to be angry. Surely a man was entitled to some consideration!

In spite of it all, however, there was, in a far-away corner of his soul, an uneasy consciousness of a tiny voice of scorn dubbing this running away of his the act of a coward and a cad.

Very resolutely, however, he silenced this voice by recounting again to himself how really abused he was. It was a long story. It served to occupy his mind all through the unappetizing meal he tried to eat at the cheap restaurant before climbing Elm Hill.

His father greeted him cordially, and with no surprise in voice or manner—which was what Burke had expected, inasmuch as he had again fallen into the way of spending frequent evenings at the old home. Tonight, however, Burke himself was constrained and ill at ease. His jaw was still firmly set and his head was still high; but his heart was beginning to fail him, and his mind was full of questionings.

HOW would his father take it—this proposition to stay all night? He would understand something of what it meant. He could not help but understand. But what would he say? How would he act? Would he say in actions, if not in words, that dreaded "I told you so"? Would it unseal his lips on a subject so long tabooed, and set him into a lengthy dissertation on the foolishness of his son's marriage? Burke believed that, as he felt now, he could not stand that; but he could stand less easily going back to the Dale Street flat that night. He could go to a hotel, of course. But he did not want to do that. He wanted dad. But he did not want dad—to talk.

"How's the baby?" asked John Denby, as Burke dropped himself into a chair on the cool, quiet veranda. "I thought she was not looking very well the last time Helen wheeled her up here." Always John Denby's first inquiry now was for his little granddaughter.

"Eh? The baby? Oh, she—she's all right. That is"—Burke paused for a short laugh—"she's well."

John Denby turned sharply.

"But she's not—all right?"

Burke laughed again.

"Oh, yes, she's all right, too, I suppose," he retorted, a bit grimly. "But she was—er—humph! Well, I'll tell you." And he gave a graphic description of his return home that night.

"Oh, what a mess!—and ink, too," ejaculated John Denby, with more than a tinge of sympathy in his voice. "How'd she ever manage to clean it up?"

Burke shrugged his shoulders.

"Ask me something easy. I don't know, I'm sure. I cleared out."

"Without—your dinner?" John Denby asked the question after a very brief, but very tense, silence.

"My dinner—I got in the square."

Burke's lips snapped together again tight shut. John Denby said nothing.

Burke cleared his throat and hesitated. He had not intended to ask his question quite so soon; but suddenly he was consumed with an overwhelming desire to speak out and get it over. He cleared his throat again.

"Dad—would you mind—my sleeping here tonight? It's just that I—I want a good night's sleep, for once," he plunged on hurriedly, in answer to a swift something that he saw leap to his father's eyes. "And I can't get it there—with the baby and all."

There was a perceptible pause. Then, steadily, and with easy cordiality, came John Denby's reply.

"Why, certainly, my boy. I'm glad to have you. I'll ring at once for Benton to see that—that your old room is made ready for you," he added, touching a push-button near his chair.

LATER, when Benton had come and gone, with his kindly old face alight and eager, Burke braced himself for what he thought was inevitable. Something would come of course. The only question was, what would it be?

But nothing came—that is, nothing in the nature of what Burke had expected. John Denby, after Benton had left the veranda, turned to his son with a pleasantly casual—

"Oh, Brett was saying today that the K. & O. people had granted us an extension of time on that bridge contract."

"Er—yes," plunged in Burke warmly. And with the words, every taut nerve and muscle in his body relaxed as if cut in twain.

It came later, though, when he had ceased to look for it. It came just as he was thinking of saying good-night.

"It has occurred to me, son," broached John Denby, after a short pause, "that Helen may be tired and in sore need of a rest."

Burke caught his breath, and held it a moment suspended. When before had his father mentioned Helen, save to speak of her casually in connection with the baby?

"Er—er—y-yes, very likely," he stammered, a sudden vision coming to him of Helen as he had seen her on the floor in the midst of the inky chaos a short time before.

"You're not the only one that isn't finding the present state of affairs a—a bed of roses, Burke," said John Denby then.

"Er—ah—n-no," muttered the amazed husband. In his ears now rang Helen's—"Maybe you think I ain't tired of working and pinching and slaving!" Involuntarily he shivered and glanced at his father—dad could not, of course, have heard!

"I have a plan to propose," announced John Denby quietly, after a moment's silence. "As I said, I think Helen needs a rest—and a change. I've seen quite a little of her since the baby came, you know, and I've noticed—many things. I will send her a check for ten thousand dollars to-morrow if she will take the baby and go away for a time—say, to her old home for a visit. But there is one other condition," he continued, lifting a quick hand to silence Burke's excited interruption. "I need a rest and change myself. I should like to go to Alaska again; and I'd like to have you go with me. Will you go?"

BURKE sprang to his feet and began to pace up and down the wide veranda. (From boyhood Burke had always "thrashed things out" on his feet.) For a full minute now he said nothing. Then, abruptly, he stopped and wheeled about. His face was very white.

"Dad, I can't. It seems too much like—like——"

The Mission of the Nation

AMERICA is at war. Whatever differences of opinion there may have been regarding provocations, necessities, the rights or the wrongs, the fact remains, and loyal Americans everywhere accept the fact and are placing themselves unreservedly at the service of their country, to do their bit, whatever it may be.

Even as there were differences of opinion as to the entrance of America into the war, so there are now differences of opinion as to the reasons why America has been drawn into the conflict. Some think that the whole war is a judgment upon the world for its lack of faith, for its worldliness, and for its sins. These feel that America has been drawn in because America has placed economic wealth above spiritual truth; because her gods have been the gods of wealth rather than the God of truth and justice. On the other hand, there are those who feel that war has been brought on by the wickedness of men, and that it is not necessarily a chastisement by outraged heaven, but that God now, as in the past, will in the end bring the wrath of men to praise him. These feel that America's entrance into the war may be God's means of insuring a righteous peace and a settlement of the problems which underlay the beginning of the war.

The President has taken the high ground that America is fighting only to make the world safe for democracy; that the Stars and Stripes are again to wave in battle for the liberty of men, and that America seeks neither indemnity nor territory. It may well be that this American attitude will eventually come to be the attitude of all the nations now at arms. America's voice may yet call the world back to sanity and justice, peace and neighborliness. But how shall America prepare for this task, this superhuman endeavor?

Economic conferences, councils of war with our allies, will help toward the victory over the enemy and may in this way lead toward peace. But if America is really to lead the world, America must gain a national conscience, a national conviction that will have the force of an intent, and it must be a righteous intent.

Before the war, England bought certain goods from Germany and Austria; so did America; so did France, Belgium and Russia; and Germany and Austria bought goods of all the others. None of them maintained these commercial relations because they loved the others particularly, but because they needed the goods and bought them where they could buy to the best advantage to themselves. In the process of this commercial intercourse, certain mutual understandings of each other's natures naturally resulted, and there were those before the war who were foolish enough to see in international business a guaranty of peace. No matter what arrangements the present allies may make for the exclusion of present enemies in trade after the war, economic advantages will break down every regulation, and a few years of peace will see old relationships fairly well reestablished.

Whatever indemnity is paid on either side will be a charge on industry and will in the long run be paid by the world at large, no matter what nation is primarily liable for payment. As for territory, the restoration of ancient boundaries, with such modifications as are necessary to eliminate interracial frictions, is perhaps the only basis upon which future peace may be predicated.

What shall America do, then? Shall she pray for victory? Every other nation is praying to the same God for the same thing. She can, however, pray for the ability to deserve victory and for the capacity to render justice, to make peace in righteousness, leading the world at the council table of peace in the spirit of the Master who commanded us to love our enemies.

The Crop Outlook

THERE is no one better qualified to speak with authority concerning food conditions and their regulation than Herbert C. Hoover, who has had a larger experience in dealing with this problem than any other American. Mr. Hoover has given his views on the proposition for official price-fixing of food commodities, and is decidedly opposed to it. In this attitude he has the hearty support of the producing class—the farmers themselves—who are doing their best to meet the government's call for larger crops, but who have been somewhat perplexed at the proposed introduction of a price-fixing system here, when it has proved so unsatisfactory in other lands. That regulation is desirable they readily agree; but they regard the prevention of the cornering of products by middlemen and speculators as pretty nearly all that is needed to regulate the market.

There is a note of discouragement in the official wheat crop report just issued in Washington. Our winter wheat crop is estimated at 366,000,000 bushels, to which may be added 250,000,000 bushels of spring wheat, making a total of 616,000,000 bushels. It is the poorest outlook in thirteen years, and, unless our present average of domestic consumption is considerably reduced, there will be little more wheat harvested than would ordinarily suffice for our own needs. The normal domestic demand is about 600,000,000 bushels, and if Europe's needs call for 500,000,000, the shortage is obvious. Indeed, it would still be a serious shortage even if only half the foreign need was supplied by us. Last year we sent Europe 243,000,000 bushels of wheat. Fortunately, other crops give much better promise. Corn, oats and potatoes will not only be in each case a full yield, but "running over." If we are to help Europe to any substantial extent, the coming season will have to be with ourselves one of self-denial, with a much more general domestic use of corn.

The Beauty of Kindness

KINDNESS is the overflowing of self upon others. It is the carpet on the floor which deadens the sound of shuffling feet and adds warmth to silence. "Kindness" is a composite word, meaning generosity, gentility, genuineness. It is a friendly ray of sunshine to another soul. It helps the blind man across the street. It cares for the little child in danger. It oils the grating doors of a squeaking world. It turns funereal faces into the brightness of beauty. It changes the countenance of winter into spring, of clouds into sunshine.

Abraham Lincoln gave many examples in his life of loving kindness. One was when he stopped his horse by the roadside, in order to put lost little birds back in their nest; and another when he restored condemned soldiers to the longing arms of loved ones. General Grant showed the same spirit when he said to General Lee at Appomattox, "Let your soldiers keep their horses; they will need them for the spring plowing." Such brotherly kindness helped to put these heroes in the Hall of Fame.

God's Word says of the kindhearted: "Thy spirit is sweet above honey, and pleasant words are as honeycomb, sweet to the soul." Faber remarks, "Kindnesses are the grasses of the spiritual field whereon the sheep of Christ feed quietly beneath the Shepherd's eye."

Big Talk and Enlistments

NOW, as always, it is not the biggest talkers who are the biggest doers. On the contrary, those elements who were most loudly insistent that this nation should get into the war are the last to be heard from at the recruiting offices.

Taking the country in a large way, this is strikingly illustrated. New York City and New England have been from the first the center of the war movement. For nearly three years, through their newspapers and public men, they have kept up a constant and lusty clamor for war. They were foremost in decrying President Wilson's peace policy and the pacifism of the West, and they were the most exultant when war finally was declared.

Meanwhile, the West had been conservative regarding war. No demands for war came from that great section. Its pre-eminent leaders in Congress deprecated and resisted the growing war spirit. Nebraska, in particular, aroused the disapprobation of the patriotic East because of its willingness to endorse by popular suffrage the vote of its junior Senator in Congress in opposition to the war movement.

These differences are past, it is true, but they are not to be forgotten in view of the daily records of the recruiting offices. May 1 will serve as a fair example. On that day the state of New York with its more than 10,000,000 population furnished 161 recruits for the army; on the same day Illinois furnished 390, Indiana 293 and Nebraska 117. The combined population of the three western states is less than that of New York, but they gave five times as many of their boys to defend their country.

On the same day that "pacifist" Nebraska furnished 117 recruits, the "patriotic" states of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maine, Vermont and Delaware, with six times the population of Nebraska, furnished only eighty-two recruits. These seven states, to be up to Nebraska, should have supplied 700 soldiers instead of a beggarly eighty-two.

Chicagoans have been bitterly accused of apathy, and their mayor is threatened with criminal proceedings because he does not hurrah as loudly as the East would like; but there has not been a single day of recruiting in which Chicago's enlistments have not exceeded those of New York City, more than twice as large and more than a thousand times as "patriotic" in shouting. On the very first day of recruiting the little city of Muncie, Indiana, population 35,000, had more than five times as many enlistments as New York City, population 6,000,000.

And now, as always, it is not the biggest talkers who are the biggest doers.

Prohibition for the War

WHEN the Congressional Democratic caucus, by a vote of 87 to 60, declared for national prohibition during the war, the motive perhaps was not so much moral as economic. Immeasurably vast moral forces, influences and organization were behind it, but economic necessities lay directly in front.

In the oncoming emergency this nation needs to conserve every ounce of its food material and every bit of its man power. Liquor eats up both. It is a plain economic proposition that the waste of foodstuff and of man-stuff, through liquor, must be stopped.

The quantity of foodstuffs now wasted in intoxicants will, when rightly used, give a half-pound loaf of bread every day to every one of the twenty-five million families in the United States. With alarming food shortage, possibly serious famine, impending, this daily loaf of bread for every family looms very large in importance.

It has been shown that the use of liquor decreases the efficiency of labor all the way from 15 to 30 per cent. This lost efficiency must be saved. The farms, the mills, the factories, the railroads and every other department of production, transportation and trade are calling for more men and better men. This lost percentage of efficiency is in high demand. It is a time when every man owes it to his country to be at his best, and when his country owes it to him to make him at his best. Also, the hundreds of thousands of men now employed in the manufacture and sale of liquor are needed in employments that are helpful to the public good.

Germany, Russia, France and England have been forced to abolish liquor during the war. With their example before us, can we lack the foresight to perceive the same necessity with us? With a great moral organization back of us, can we falter in taking the step at once?

That the nation should do its very best to produce foodstuffs to meet the crisis is very well, but it is not enough; it must also do its very best to conserve and rightly use its full product.

Light on Prophecy

THERE is abundant evidence that the study of prophecy holds a vital interest for many minds today—more, we believe, than in any preceding generation. This is not surprising in view of the tremendous events that are now taking place, involving world-changes of such importance that they are almost beyond human estimation.

One of the foremost authorities on prophecy, Dr. James M. Gray, dean of the Moody Institute, Chicago, has sent us the following letter, in fulfilment of his promise made to the readers of the Christian Herald several months ago:

> Editor of the Christian Herald:
> Herewith find the first two of the series on "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy."
> There will (I think) be eight in the series, the titles being
> 1. The Seed of the Woman, or, The First Promise of Redemption.
> 2. God's Covenant with Noah, or, Why He Chose Israel
> 3. God's Covenant with David, or, The Kingdom to Come
> 4. The Times of the Gentiles, or, The Judgments to Come
> 5. Israel Restored and Renewed.
> 6. The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption.
> 7. The Antichrist: Who He Is, and When He Will Arise
> 8. The Day of the Lord: When It Comes, and What It Means.
> I think it desirable to have them appear as near together as possible. JAMES M. GRAY.

Professor Gray's prophetic articles in the Christian Herald during 1916 were widely read. We believe the new series, to the preparation of which he has devoted much care and reverent research, will be universally welcomed. He is a deep and devout student, and his latest contributions to prophetic enlightenment should be read not only by the Christian Herald Family but by all of their friends. Here is an opportunity for every one of our readers to do missionary service of the best sort by urging at least one more, not now a reader of the paper, to join our Circle during the period of publication of Dr. Gray's series." The first contribution will appear in our issue of June 6.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

Won $300,000, Bankrupt

AN old man dressed in a shiny, threadbare frock coat, and trousers that bagged at the knees, with hat out of date and faded, and an old-fashioned black stock around his neck, took passage at Albany on the Hudson River night boat recently. He had no money to hire a stateroom, so he sat in a chair in the cabin and dozed till morning. On leaving the boat he fainted and was carried back on board and laid on a couch. When he came to he whispered, "I am so weak, I have not had enough to eat the past three days." The boat physician gave him a fine breakfast, which he devoured greedily. In his clothing were found papers which identified him as Edwin Stanton, who in 1867, it is said, won $300,000 in one night at Monte Carlo, forcing the famous Casino to close temporarily. He admitted that he was that man, and said that luck had turned against him, and that he would "come back" again. It is not likely. His ill-gotten gain was a curse to him in fortune and in spirit. Not all money gained dishonestly gets away. It is often piled up in colossal fortunes, but the owner has to leave it at last, a pitiable spiritual bankrupt. "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool." (Jer. 17 : 11.)

Bible in Hotel Rooms

NOTWITHSTANDING the increased cost of paper and other materials, the Gideons intend to see that a Bible is placed in every hotel room in the United States and Canada. This was decided upon at the annual convention of the New York State Gideons the other day. The life of the commercial traveler is one of unusual temptation; away from home, thrown into all kinds of company, the moral perils are great. In olden times they were greater, when the "drummer" was expected to treat his customer to something to drink. Fortunately, the wholesome temperance sentiment of the country has pretty well ended the custom. Despite these temptations the traveling salesmen, as a rule, are men of ability and honor. One of the best moral forces among the traveling men has been the Gideons, a Christian fraternity, which is manly, clean, and evangelical in its example and teaching. The organization, which is well known to Christian Herald readers, has been working for a number of years toward the universal distribution of Bibles in hotel rooms. Eternity alone can tell the good results of placing these Bibles, God's silent but unspeakably eloquent messengers of salvation. The Gideons are in imitation of Gideon and his band, who triumphed in battle by faith and the divine instrumentality. How peculiarly appropriate for them to distribute the "Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God"! "And the three companies blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, and held the lamps in their left hands, and the trumpets in their right hands to blow withal; and they cried, The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." (Judges 7 : 20.)

The Duma and Revolution

AT the close of the Russo-Japanese war popular opinion compelled the granting by the Czar of a constitution and a parliament which was called the Duma. It was hard for the vacillating Czar and the autocratic ministry who controlled him to give the people their rights through the Duma, and that body was from time to time dissolved by imperial edict. There were two Russias—that of the Czar and his ministers, who lived in the palaces, sent representatives to foreign nations, used the army to oppress the people, banished those guilty of small offenses to Siberia, and persecuted and murdered the Jews. The other Russia was the people, expressing themselves somewhat through the Duma, but clamoring for more liberty. About two months ago the Duma was ordered to dissolve for a month, which it flatly refused to do, but instead, in a sharp civil strife of only a few hours, it deposed the Czar on March 15 and took charge of the government and proclaimed a free form of government for the people, and by the wisdom and courage of the liberal leaders a revolution was wrought which might have taken a hundred years to accomplish. The president of the Duma, M. Rodzianko, and the great parliamentary Liberal leader, Professor Paul N. Milukoff, are backed by the Duma and the leaders of the local governments and cool, level-headed men with practical notions of statesmanship, loyalty to their country and intense love for the common people, and it is expected that they will construct the new government in the interest of the people of Russia and of a universal democracy. Now, troubles are sure to occur in so great freedom so suddenly found; riots and other disturbances may be looked for, but the leaders are sagacious men with the highest motives, and they will realize that their wisdom and moderation in the use of their liberty will be necessary to preserve a permanent democracy. It was God's truth that made Russia free. Of nations as well as of individuals it can be said: "The truth shall make you free." (John 8 : 32.)

"Pelorus Jack" Dead

THE story of the marvelous doings of Jack, the pilot fish, has been told with startling interest for the past twenty-five years, but many have considered it a "fish story" spun out of the imagination of some sailor, and a mighty big fish story at that. But Jack was a real fish, and his doings are part of the marvelous history of the sea. His recent death calls to mind his deeds. For thirty-five years Pelorus Jack, a beautiful dolphin of dazzling blue and white color, about fourteen feet long, acted as pilot to convoy steamships from Wellington to Nelson at a point near French Pass, New Zealand. Jack always kept on the starboard bow, as he knew that was the captain's side of the ship. Skippers who followed him never grounded on shoals or hit rocks, and this became so well known that many of the older mariners would not go through French Pass unless he was ready to pilot them. They all took a delight in feeding him meat and fresh loaves. One of his best friends was Captain Inman R. Sealby, and the two were so chummy that Jack would seem to miss two or three other vessels when Sealby's ship was due. In 1904 a rich "young blood" came along with his pleasure yacht and Jack offered to take him through, when he was repaid for his kindness by a shot from a gun fired by the young man. Partly on account of the wound, and partly because he was offended by the harsh treatment, he threw up his job as pilot and disappeared for three months. The New Zealand government sent out a dispatch boat to look for him, and Jack was discovered hiding up a small inlet and brought back to French Pass. To protect him from further attacks, the governor of New Zealand issued a special order in council establishing a fine of $500 for any person who attempted to injure "Pelorus Jack." But Jack grew old and rheumatic, and unable to hold his job, and he pined away and died of old age. His body was thrown upon the sandy beach near French Pass, and the crew of a coast steamer dug a trench, covered the body with seaweed, buried it and planted a blue gumtree at the head and one at the foot to mark his resting-place. It is said that after the war the seamen in that trade will raise money and rear a monument to "Pelorus Jack," the only fish ever honored by a special order in council. This intelligent and beautiful creature, who spent a long life in conducting ships through danger, teaches eloquently this lesson of unselfishness: "None of us liveth to himself." (Rom. 14 : 7.)

Venison for All

IT is said that only one person in a hundred in this country has the opportunity or money to buy venison as a regular article of food. The meat is so delicious that considerable attention is paid to the serious proposition to raise deer and elk as a food product for the masses. It is claimed that venison can be raised from herds of animals in as large quantities and as cheaply as beef, mutton or pork, and the common people can have as a staple that which now is a forbidden luxury. The ordinary deer have so much of the wild in them that it is difficult if not impossible to domesticate them, and yet they will thrive and multiply in herds in a semi-wild state, and much of the year in many parts actually take care of themselves. The elk is more easily domesticated, and grows into meat rapidly, weighing from 600 to 1,000 pounds. Now, when the food supply of the world is so critical a problem, it is well to consider venison, which it is said can be raised easily and profitably. The Jews prized deer meat as a luxury. Isaac was fond of it and gave his command: "Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me some venison." (Gen. 27 : 3.)

Twenty-two Hero Medals

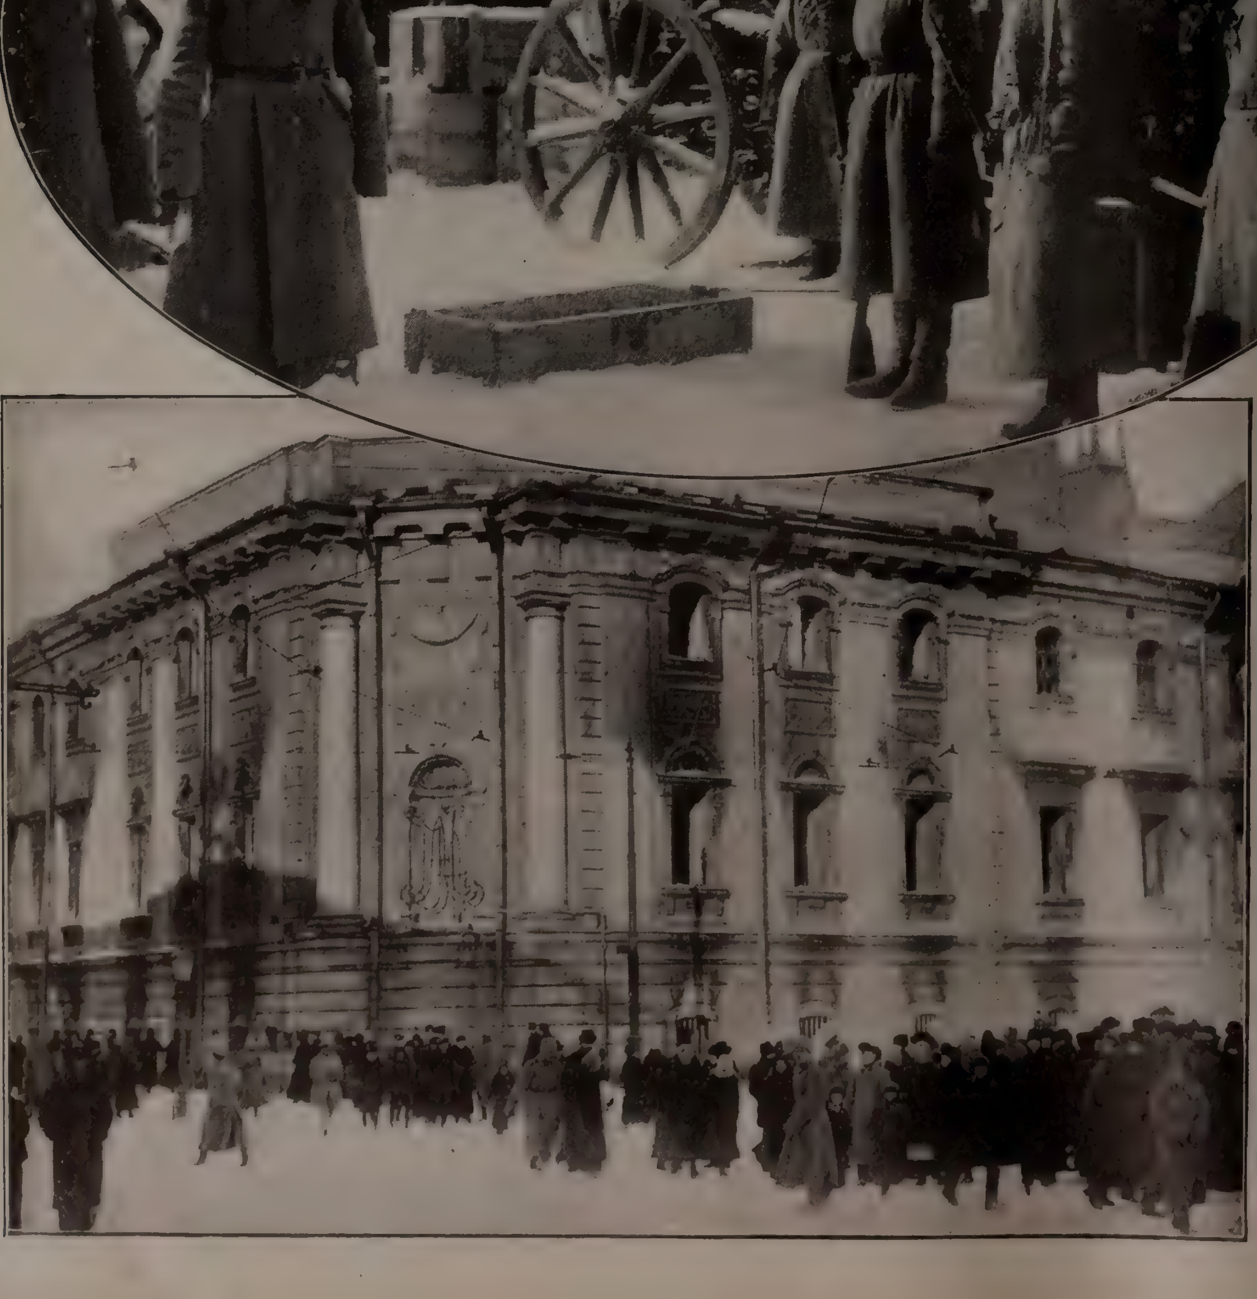
TWENTY-TWO acts of heroism were recognized by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission at its meeting held in Pittsburg the other day. In one case a silver medal was awarded, in twenty-one cases bronze medals. Four of the heroes lost their lives, and to the dependents of two of these pensions aggregating $840 a year were granted. To the dependent of one of the others who lost their lives, the sum of $500 was granted. In addition to these money grants, in five cases $6,300 was appropriated for educational purposes. This benevolence is a beautiful one, but it can only notice or reward one out of the hundreds of acts of genuine heroism performed in our land every day in the year. Many of the ordinary callings of life have the heroic element in them. There is not a policeman, or fireman, or railroad man, or sailor, or miner, or physician who does not take his life in his hand for others every time he leaves his home. If we could see with eyes stronger than those of the body the precious ones who gave their lives to save the bodies or souls of their fellows, welcomed with shouts by the throng on the other side of the river, we would realize somewhat the meaning of the words of the Christ: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 10 : 39.)

RUSSIA THROWS OFF THE YOKE

The First Photographs of the Russian Revolution to Reach America

This building above was once a prison, but liberty opened its gates, vengeance applied the torch, and political prisoners were set free

This gun, at the left, once of the royal artillery, fought with the people and with the soldiers who had espoused their cause as they drove from the streets of Petrograd the police and the armies of reaction



The building at the left was once called the High Court of Justice, but the crimes committed in the name of the blind goddess were purged by the flames of a people's wrath

THE Russian is a patient being. For centuries he suffered the autocratic rule of the Czar. For decades multiplied he bore oppression, injustice, hardship, grinding poverty, and plodded on, stolid, frugal, loyal; now and then he shrugged his mighty shoulders, autocracy trembled for an instant; Siberia gained a few thousand more victims; and Russia was again Russia as of old.

Yet when the world was in the twentieth century, no "Little Father," no clergy adept in the manipulation of ignorance and superstition, no power of wealth or of bureaucracy could long keep from the great heart of Russia the impulse toward liberty, which had swept aside the prerogatives of monarchs in nearly every quarter of the earth. In spite of restrictions on education, in spite of clergy, in spite of poverty, each year saw in Russia a stronger movement toward ultimate democracy, until, at the breaking out of the world war, it was said that Russia was facing almost certain revolution; and it was even suggested that the governing classes of Russia welcomed the war as furnishing a diversion, a new opportunity for the welding of the mujik through conflict to a new and more steadfast loyalty. If the Romanoffs had any such feeling at the beginning of the war, we know now upon what false pretenses it was based; for March 12 saw the Romanoffs dethroned and the Czar of all the Russias a prisoner in the hands of his former subjects, become citizens.

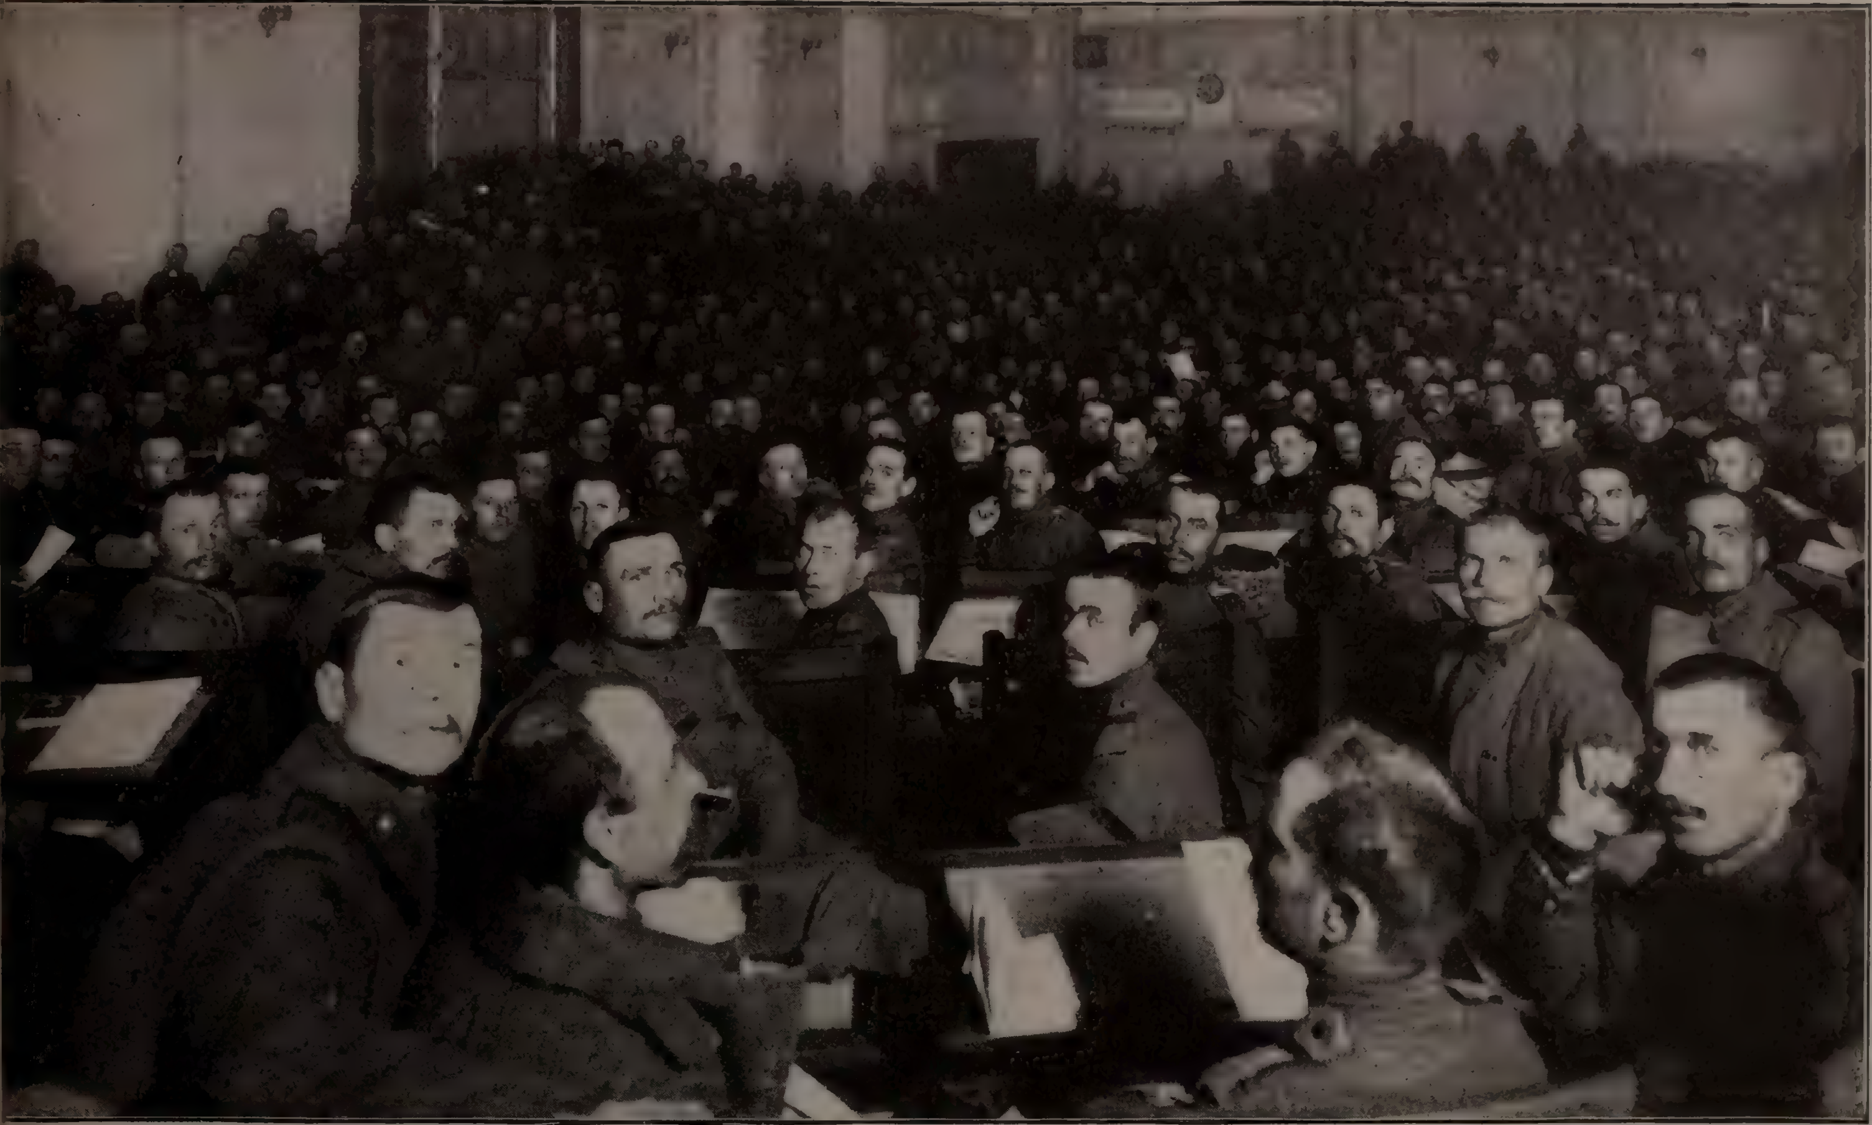
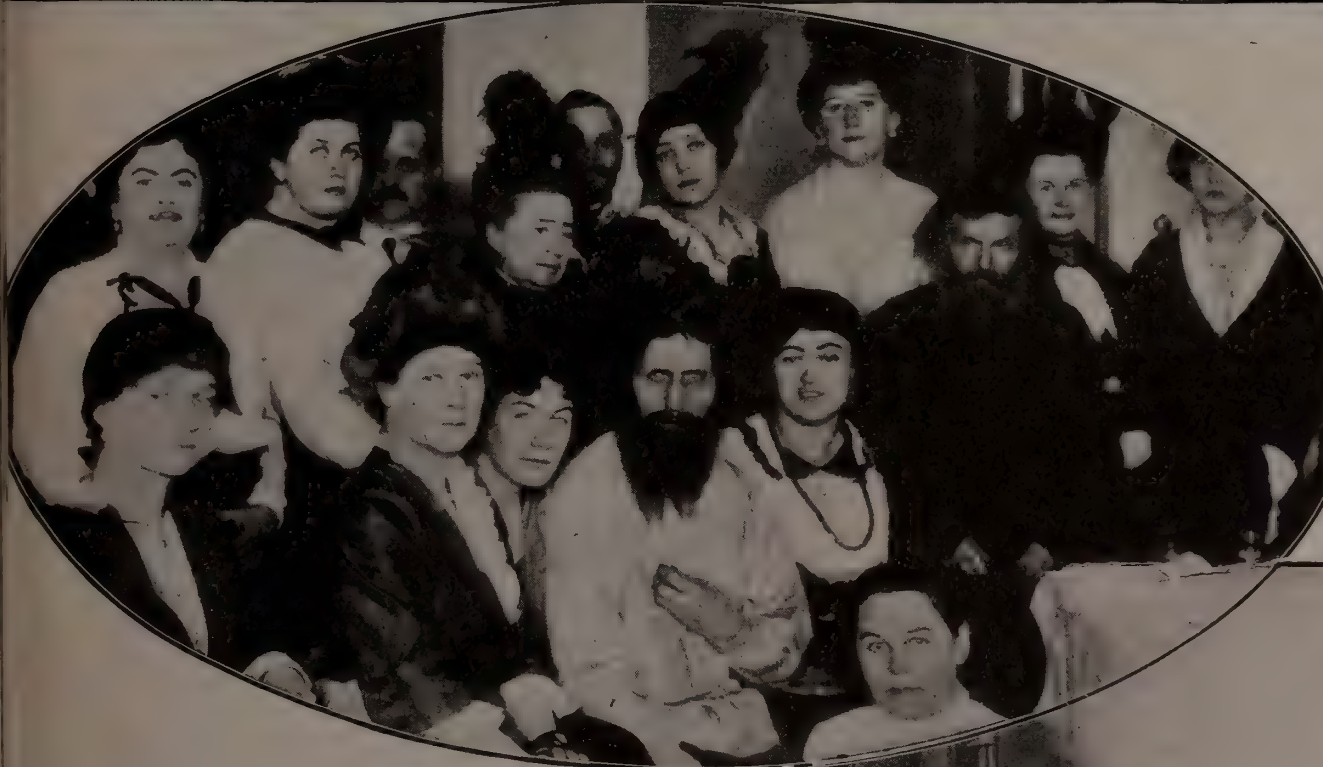
Even as the French, at the first outburst of the revolution, stormed the Bastile, so the Russians emptied and fired the jails and ravaged and burned the imposing structures which had once housed the tribunals whose verdicts were such a travesty on the justice they professed to serve. Nor did they stop there; but a call went far and wide across the snowy steppes and barren ranges of Siberia. Convicts many, and the banished leaders who had dared to think in terms of liberty heard free Russia calling them home to lend their voice and influence to the government of liberty. It was to be expected that a government formed out of a seething mass of recently liberated subjects would face stormy seas and escape by narrow margins many an uncharted reef. The peasants, the workmen, the soldiers and the intellectuals, with their varying desires, attitudes of mind and purpose, would certainly find it difficult immediately to harmonize their viewpoints and to find a common platform upon which to strive forward for free Russia.

On May 1 the course of the Workmen's and

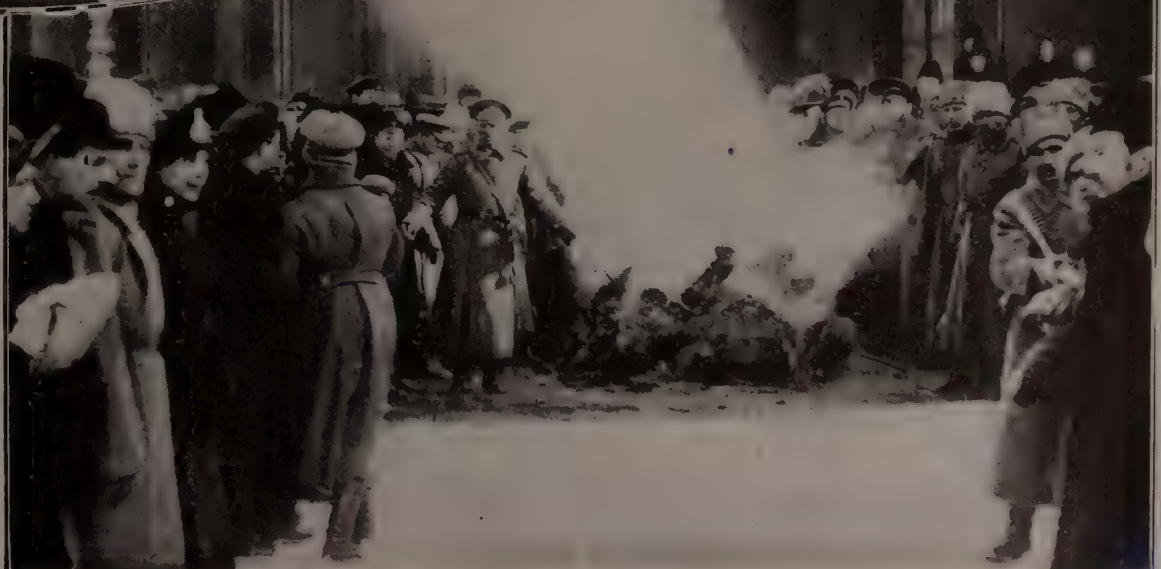


In that capital where once a throttled Duma raised its ineffectual voice against the usurpations of autocracy, now meets this representative council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies which, with the Duma, is working out the problems of the new Russia. This is the first official picture to reach America



An unusual picture, this at the left, of Gregory Rasputin, the Siberian peasant, the mystic monk, the fateful power behind the throne of Russia, maker of dynasties, and destroyer of governments, whose assassination in the home of a prince near Petrograd was one of the first blows in the Russian revolution

Soldiers' Deputies in challenging the provisional government, the riots in the streets of the capital, the arbitrary action of many peasants in the Zemstvos or local councils in different parts of the nation, seemed to presage early disaster for the provisional government, a disaster in which every nation fighting against Germany might share. But on May 7 explanations had been made, and the Socialist council, the Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies and the cabinet had reached an agreement. The government appeared before the world stronger than ever, while Russia began to assume the lineaments and figure of real nationality.



Lest the insignia of royalty should draw back to their former fealty an outraged people, arms, escutcheons and trappings of royalty were publicly burned in the streets of Petrograd

Billy Sunday Scores the Saloon

A Sermon Preached in the Big New York Tabernacle on Sunday, May 13 *

AFTER all is said that can be said on the open licensed saloon, its degrading influence upon the individual, upon business, upon public morals, upon the home, there is one prime reason why the saloon has not been driven from the land long ago—that is the lying argument that saloons are needed to lighten taxes. I challenge you to show me any community where a saloon license policy has lightened taxes.

Seventy-five per cent. of our idiots came from intemperate parents. There are more insane people in the United States than students in the universities and colleges. In Kansas there are 81 counties without an insane man or woman.

There are fifty-four counties that have no feeble-minded. Eighty per cent. of the paupers are whisky-made paupers. In Kansas there is only one pauper to every 3,000 of the population. There are thirty-eight counties without a pauper; there are eighteen counties which do not even own a farm for the poor; there are only 600 paupers in the State.

Ninety per cent. of our adult criminals are drinking men, and committed their crimes while under the influence of booze.

In 1914 there were sixty-five counties in Kansas with no prisoners in their jails. In some counties they have not called a grand jury to try a charge in ten years.

The people have over $200,000,000 on deposit in the banks. The death rate is the smallest in the world—seven out of every 1,000 of the population.

In the State of Massachusetts in ten years the yearly average of crime has been 32,639 cases, and 31,978 have been caused by drink. The Chicago Tribune kept track of the number of murders committed in the saloons in ten years and the number was 53,436.

Archbishop Ireland said, "I find social crime and ask what caused it? They say, 'drink!' I find poverty. What caused it? 'Drink!' I find families broken up and ask what caused it. They tell me 'drink!' I find men behind prison bars and ask, 'What put you here?' They say, 'drink!' I stand by the scaffold and ask, 'What made you a murderer?' They cry 'drink!—drink!' "

The saloon is the appalling source of misery, pauperism and crime. It is the source of three-fourths of all the crime, thus it is the source of three-fourths of all the taxation necessary to prosecute the criminals and care for them after they are in prison. To license such an incarnate fiend of hell is one of the blackest spots on the American government.

Who foots the bills? The landlord who loses his rent, the baker, butcher, grocer, coal man, dry goods merchant, whose goods the drunkard needs for himself and family, but cannot buy—the charitable persons who pity the children of drunkards, and go down in their pockets to keep them from starving—the taxpayers, who are taxed to support the jails, penitentiaries, hospitals, almshouses, reformatories that this cursed business keeps filled.

Who makes the money? The brewers, distillers, saloon-keepers, who are privileged to fill the land with poverty, wretchedness, madness, crime, disease, damnation, and death, authorized by the sovereign right of the people, who vote for this infamous business.

The man who votes for the saloon helps the devil get his boy. The man who doesn't believe in a hell has never seen a drunkard's home. The devil and the saloon-keeper are always pulling on the same rope.

The saloon advocates cried, "If you vote out the saloons there will be a panic, the farmer will get nothing for his corn." In the past three years we have voted out of business 24,000 booze joints and the farmer receives more for his corn than ever.

The entire income of the government to all the states and cities and towns in revenue and license was about $350,000,000. You say, that's a big pile of money; so it is, but wait a minute! Last year the working men spent $2,290,500,000 for drink.

It cost us to care for the products of the saloon, $1,200,000,000. In other words the output for the saloon, adding these amounts, was $3,490,500,000. Subtract from that the income of $350,000,000; that leaves $3,140,500,000 that the saloons cost us, purely from the standpoint of cold money.

The money spent for drink in the United States in one year would duplicate all the National Banks' capital and surplus and leave a balance of $700,000,000.

The amount spent for drink would in two years duplicate the capital and surplus of all the banks in the United States and leave $1,000,000,000.

The saloon is usually found in partnership with the foes of good government. It supports the boodle alderman, corrupt law-maker, the political boss and machine.

The liquor interests are still fat—sleek—smug and powerful with many city, state and national governments at their feet, and they are reaching out with their slimy hands to choke, throttle and assassinate the character of those whom they cannot debauch and who dare attack their hellish business.

But their doom is sealed. If the people are fit for self-government, if the people are fit for liberty, the wrath of an outraged public will never be quenched until the putrid corpse of the saloon is hanging from the gibbet of shame; praise God from whom all blessings flow!

I tell you, gentlemen, the American home is the dearest heritage of the people, for the people and by the people, and when a man can go from home in the morning with the kisses of wife and children on his lips and come back at night with an empty dinner bucket to a happy home, that man is a better man, whether white or black.

Whatever takes away the comforts of home—whatever degrades that man or woman—whatever invades the sanctity of the home, is the deadliest foe to the home, to church, to state and school, and the saloon is the deadliest foe to the home, the church and the state, on the top of God Almighty's earth.

The open licensed saloon eats the carpets off your floor, the clothes from off your back, your money out of the bank, and it eats up character, and it goes on until at last it leaves a stranded wreck in the home, a skeleton of what was once brightness and happiness.

There was a drummer on a railroad train. There were some men playing cards, and one fellow pulled out a whisky flask and passed it about, and when it came to the drummer he said, "No!" "What," they said, "have you got on the water wagon?" and they all laughed at him. He said, "You can laugh if you want to, but I was born with an appetite for drink, and for years I have taken from five to ten glasses per day, but I was at home in Chicago not long ago, and I have a friend who has a pawnshop there. I was in there when in came a young fellow with ashen cheeks and a wild look on his face. He came up trembling, threw down a little package and said, "Give me ten cents.' And what do you think was in that package? It was a pair of baby shoes.

"My friend said, 'No, I cannot take them.'

"But he said, 'Give me a dime; I must have a drink.'

"'No, take them back home; your baby will need them.'

"And the poor fellow said, 'My baby is dead and I want a drink.'"

Who works the hardest for his money, the saloon man or you? Who has the most money Sunday morning, the saloon man or you?

The saloon comes as near being a rat-hole for a wage-earner to dump his wages in as anything you can find. The only interest it pays is red eyes and foul breath, and the loss of your health. You go in with money and you come out with empty pockets. You go in with character and you come out ruined. You go in with a good position and you lose it.

And it pays nothing back but disease and damnation and gives an extra dividend in delirium tremens and a free pass to hell. And then it will let your wife be buried in the potter's field, and your children go to the asylum, and yet you walk out and say that the saloon is a good institution, when it is the dirtiest thing on earth.

"But," you say, "we will regulate it by high license."

Regulate what by high license? You might as well try and regulate a powder mill in hell. Do you want to pay taxes in boys or dirty money?

The saloon will steal the milk from the breast of the mother and leave her with nothing with which to feed her infant. It will take the virtue from your daughter. It is the dirtiest, most low-down, damnable business that ever crawled out of the pit of hell. It is a sneak and a thief and a coward.

It is an infidel. It has no faith in God; has no religion. It would close every church in the land. It would hang its beer signs on the abandoned altars. It would close every public school. It respects the thief and it esteems the blasphemer. It fills the prisons and the penitentiaries. It despises heaven, hates love, scorns virtue.

It tempts the passions. Its music is the song of a siren. Its sermons are a collection of lewd, vile stories. It wraps a mantle about the hope of this world and that to come. It is the moral clearing house for rot, and damnation, and poverty, and insanity, and it wrecks homes and blights lives today.

The saloon is a liar. It promises good cheer and sends sorrow. It promises health and causes disease. It promises prosperity and sends adversity. It promises happiness and sends misery.

It cocks the highwayman's pistol. It puts the rope in the hands of the mob. It is the anarchist of the world, and its dirty red flag is dyed with the blood of women and children.

What is that music I hear? A funeral dirge. Yonder goes a funeral procession 3,000 miles long. Six hundred thousand men die from the effects of drink each year, eighty every hour, 2,000 each day. One man leaps from a train; another will plunge into a river; another will throw his hands to his head and cry "Mother," and his life will go out like a burnt match.

Do you know of any fellow who died young because he did not drink? Do you know of any fellow who committed suicide because he drank too much water?

In these days when the question of saloon or no saloon is at the fore in almost every community, one hears a good deal about what is called "personal liberty." These are fine, large, mouth-filling words and they certainly do sound first-rate; but when you get right down and analyze them in the light of common old horse-sense, you will discover that in their application to the present controversy they mean just about this: "Personal liberty" is for the man who, if he has the inclination and the price, can stand up to a bar and fill his hide so full of red liquor that he is transformed for the time into an irresponsible, dangerous, evil-smelling brute.

But "personal liberty" is not for his patient, long-suffering wife, who has to endure with what fortitude she may his blows and curses; nor is it for his children who, if they escape his insane rage, are yet robbed of every joy and privilege of childhood, and too often grow up neglected, uncared for and vicious as the result of their surroundings and the example before them.

I stand in front of the jails and penitentiaries and count the whisky-made criminals. One says, "Yes, Bill, I fired the gun." Another says, "Yes, I killed my wife." Another says, "Yes, I murdered my friend; I am waiting for the rope or the electric chair."

The booze hates the trade union. Nobody ever heard of "union-made whisky." Even a drinking bartender can't find a job. The railroads and steel mills and the manufacturers say, "No job for you if you rush the growler."

I would like to do like this: I would like to see every booze-fighter get on the water wagon. I would like to summon all the drunkards in America and say: "Boys, let's cut her out and spend the money for flour, meat and calico; what do you say?"

Come on; I'm going to line up the drunkards. We will line up in front of a butcher shop. The butcher says: "What do you want, a piece of neck?"

"No; how much do I owe you?" "Two dollars." "Here's your dough. Now give me a porterhouse steak and a sirloin roast."

"Where did you get all that money?"

"Went to hear Bill and climbed on the water wagon."

"Hello! What do you want?"

"Beefsteak."

We empty the shop and the butcher runs to the telephone. "Hey, central, give me the slaughter-house. Have you got any beef, any pork, any mutton?"

They strip the slaughter-house and then telephone to Swift, and Armour, and Nelson Morris, and Cudahy, to send down train loads of beefsteaks.

"What's the matter?"

"The whole bunch has got on the water wagon."

And the big packers in Chicago say to their salesmen: "Buy beef, pork and mutton."

The farmers see the price of cattle and sheep jump up to three times their value. Let me take the money you dump into the whisky hole and buy beefsteaks with it. I will show what is the matter with America.

What is the matter? Your children are going naked and the whisky gang has your money. That's what's the matter with you. Don't listen to those old whisky-soaked politicians who say "stand-pat on the saloon."

Some fellow says: "Drive the saloon out and the buildings will be empty." Which would you rather have, empty buildings, or empty jails, penitentiaries and insane asylums?

Go to the jails, go to the insane asylums and the penitentiaries and the homes for feeble-minded. There you will find the finished product of their dirty business. I tell you it is the worst business this side of hell, and you know it.

What is your raw material, saloons? American boys. Say, I would not give one boy for all the distilleries and saloons this side of hell. And they have to have 2,000,000 boys every generation. And then you tell me you are a man when you will vote for an institution like that. What do you want to do, pay taxes in money or in boys?

A Hammer Blow

MR. SUNDAY gave old John Barleycorn the worst scare of his life with this sermon, Sunday afternoon and evening, May 13. Billy was at his best, and his crowd was with him from start to finish, frequently standing and cheering. Mr. Rodeheaver sang for the first time in New York the song, becoming famous all over the country, "The Brewers' Big Horses Can't Run Over Me."

Trail hitting for the day set a record for the campaign, 509 in the morning, 1093 in the afternoon, 1657 at night.

Young People's Topics for June 3

What Are My Bible Study Habits?

Epworth League Topic. Jer. 36 : 21–25; Acts 17 : 11–12; Ps. 119 : 97–105

MOST of us would answer this question with silence and with a modest blush, for few of us have Bible study habits, and most of those have bad ones. Many thousands have become members of the morning watch and have lived up, more or less closely, to their obligation for daily study, receiving likewise more or less blessing in proportion to their fidelity. Some who have never taken the pledge of the morning watch never fail in their daily reading of the Word, and their lives bear witness of the spiritual strength which thus becomes the portion of mankind. But with most of us Bible study is a hit-or-miss sort of thing. If we teach a Sunday school class, we are prone to condense our study of the week's lesson into the Saturday night preceding the Sunday of the lesson, in which process we suffer a certain amount of spiritual overfeeding and consume much more Scripture than we can digest with comfort or with success.

A similar use of the Scriptures is characteristic of many whose turn it is to lead the devotional meeting of the League. No matter what the time of the warning, the time of preparation is liable to be unduly near the opening hour of the meeting, and it frequently consists of a very sketchy reading of the appointed references and a hasty scanning of some discussion of the weekly topic. These are our habits, and having them we are frequently heard bemoaning the spiritual weakness of the church and of the League. We cannot be strong physically without taking food at regular intervals and in sufficient quantity. Neither can we be strong spiritually without coming to the source of all spiritual life, the Bible, at regular intervals. Read daily and pondered upon, digested, assimilated, the Scripture will eventually bring to us a spiritual strength otherwise unknown and unattainable. The great leaders of the church have always been those who were great readers of the Word. The Reformation came because men read the Bible. The Wesleyan movement was founded in a Bible class, and the great leader of American Methodism, Asbury, spent hours every day in his study of the Word. Only thus can men lead the children of God in the work of the Kingdom.

Confidence and How to Get It

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Neh. 6 : 1–16 (Consecration meeting)

NEHEMIAH was confident because God was with him, and he knew it. A person who is right can always be confident and full of courage. A person who is doing God's will may have the assurance in his heart that God is with him, and that all is well. Confidence may be based upon our certainty of our own ability, or upon our reputation for having done things before, or upon the position of our family. Confidence based on these assumptions, and not supported by truth and righteousness, will be like the house founded upon the sands; it will most certainly meet its day of doom. There is only one sure foundation for confidence in ourselves and in our ability to succeed either in religious life or in any other avenue of life, and that foundation is righteousness. Not the righteousness of our own strength, but the righteousness that comes through the forgiveness of our sins and the redemption of us as sinners in the blood of Christ. Sin, even the little sins that we cling to because they are so trivial, will inevitably destroy the fabric of our confidence sooner or later. The little deceit, the little dishonesty that seems to hurt no one, the little lapse from strict purity, the little thought that did not lead to the deed, but was cherished nevertheless—all of these weaken the foundation of righteousness upon which confidence must rest, even as the boring insect eating away the heart of the tree finally weakens the monarch of the forest so that the tree which withstood the gale falls before a gentle breeze. But if we are right through and through, if we have the knowledge that God is with us, we can have confidence to meet all the terrors of this world in the full assurance that, no matter how wild the battle or how fierce the opposition, victory will be ours.

Cars That Differ
In a Hundred Ways

The Mitchells differ from other cars in nearly every point you consider.

In equipment, etc., there are 31 features which nearly all cars omit. In finish and luxury, they excel rival cars at least 25 per cent.

The body styles are exclusive—designed by our experts, built by our own craftsmen. And they combine in one model nearly all known attractions.

In the chassis, all vital parts are built to the standard of 100 per cent over-strength. That is twice our former margin of safety, and it means a lifetime car.

This year's output of Mitchells, if we omitted these extras, would cost us about $4,000,000 less.

Astonishing Values

When you analyze all these extra values, they seem almost impossible in cars at Mitchell prices. And they would be impossible in any ordinary shop.

But this mammoth plant—covering 45 acres—was built by a famous efficiency expert. It contains over 2,000 machines, all designed to build this one type economically.

These Bate efficiency methods, in the past few years, have cut our factory cost in two. This year we apply them to body-building, too, at a vast additional saving.

The millions of dollars which we save in these ways pay for all of these Mitchell extras.

See What We Add

See what we have added in strength and endurance. See what we add in beauty, comfort and equipment. See if you think cars strong enough without them, or handsome enough, or complete.

You will find here at least 20 per cent extra value, as compared with other high-grade Sixes. Please learn how much these extras mean, in a lifetime car.

What and Why Is the Internal Bath?

By Walter Walgrove

THOUGH many articles have been written and much has been said recently about the Internal Bath, the fact remains that a great amount of ignorance and misunderstanding of this new system of Physical Hygiene still exists.

And inasmuch as it seems that Internal Bathing is even more essential to perfect health than External Bathing, I believe that everyone should know its origin, its purpose and its action beyond the possibility of a misunderstanding.

Its great popularity started at about the same time as did what are probably the most encouraging signs of recent times—I refer to the appeal for Optimism, Cheerfulness, Efficiency and those attributes which go with them and which, if steadily practiced, will make our race not only the despair of nations competitive to us in business, but establish us as a shining example to the rest of the world in our mode of living.

These new daily "Gospels," as it were, had as their inspiration the ever present unconquerable American Ambition, for it had been proven to the satisfaction of all real students of business that the most successful man is he who is sure of himself—who is optimistic, cheerful, and impresses the world with the fact that he is supremely confident always—for the world of business has every confidence in the man who has confidence in himself.

If our outlook is optimistic, and our confidence strong, it naturally follows that we inject enthusiasm, "ginger," and clear judgment into our work, and have a tremendous advantage over those who are at times more or less depressed, blue, and nervously fearful that their judgment may be wrong who lack the confidence that comes with the right condition of mind and which counts so much for success.

Now the practice of Optimism and Confidence has made great strides in improving and advancing the general efficiency of the American, and if the mental attitude necessary to its accomplishment were easy to secure, complete success would be ours.

Unfortunately, however, our physical bodies have an influence on our mental attitude, and in this particular instance, because of a physical condition which is universal, these much-to-be-desired aids to success are impossible to consistently enjoy.

In other words our trouble, to a great degree, is physical first and mental afterwards—this physical trouble is simple and very easily corrected. Yet it seriously affects our strength and energy, and if it is allowed to exist too long becomes chronic and then dangerous.

Nature is constantly demanding one thing of us, which, under our present mode of living and eating, it is impossible for us to give—that is, a constant care of our diet, and enough consistent physical work or exercise to eliminate all waste from the system.

If our work is confining, as it is in almost every instance, our systems cannot throw off the waste except according to our activity, and a clogging process immediately sets in.

This waste accumulates in the colon (lower intestine), and is more serious in its effect than you would think, because it is intensely poisonous, and the blood circulating through the colon absorbs these poisons, circulating them through the system and lowering our vitality generally.

That's the reason that biliousness and its kindred complaints make us ill "all over." It is also the reason that this waste, if permitted to remain a little too long, gives the destructive germs, which are always present in the blood, a chance to gain the upper hand, and we are not alone inefficient, but really ill—seriously sometimes, if there is a local weakness.

This accumulated waste has long been recognized as a menace, and Physicians, Physical Culturists, Dietitians, Osteopaths and others have been constantly laboring to perfect a method of removing it, and with partial and temporary success.

It remained, however, for a new, rational and perfectly natural process to finally and satisfactorily solve the problem of how to thoroughly eliminate this waste from the colon without strain or unnatural forcing—to keep us sweet and clean and healthy and keep us correspondingly bright and strong—clearing the blood of the poisons which made it and us sluggish and dull spirited, and making our entire organization work and act as Nature intended it should.

That process is Internal Bathing with warm water—and it now, by the way, has the endorsements of the most enlightened Physicians, Physical Culturists, Osteopaths, etc., who have tried it and seen its results.

Heretofore it has been our habit, when we have found by disagreeable, and sometimes alarming symptoms, that this waste was getting much the better of us, to repair to the drug shop and obtain relief through drugging.

This is partly effectual, but there are several vital reasons why it should not be our practice as compared with Internal Bathing.

Drugs force nature instead of assisting her—Internal Bathing assists Nature and is just as simple and natural as washing our hands.

Drugs, being taken through the stomach, sap the vitality of other functions before they reach the colon, which is not called for—Internal Bathing washes out the colon and reaches nothing else.

To keep the colon consistently clean drugs must be persisted in and to be effective the doses must be increased. Internal Bathing is a consistent treatment, and need never be altered in any way to be continuously effective.

No less an authority than Professor Alonzo Clark, M. D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: All of our curative agents are poisons, and as a consequence every dose diminishes the patient's vitality.

It is rather remarkable to find, at what would seem so comparatively late a day, so great an improvement on the old methods of Internal Bathing, as this new process, for in a crude way it has, of course, been practiced for years.

It is probably no more surprising, however, than the tendency on the part of the Medical Profession to depart further and further from the custom of using drugs, and accomplish the same and better results by more natural means; causing less strain on the system and leaving no evil after effects.

Doubtless you, as well as all American men and women, are interested in knowing all that may be learned about keeping up to "concert pitch," and always feeling bright and confident.

This improved system of Internal Bathing is naturally a rather difficult subject to cover in detail in the public press, but there is a Physician who has made this his life's study and work, who has written an interesting book on the subject called "The What, The Why, The Way of the Internal Bath." This he will send free on request to anyone addressing Charles A. Tyrrell, M. D., at 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mentioning that they have read this in the Christian Herald.

It is surprising how little is known by the average person on this subject, which has so great an influence on the general health and spirits.

My personal experience and my observation make me very enthusiastic on Internal Bathing, for I have seen its results in sickness as well as in health, and I firmly believe that everybody owes it to himself, if only for the information available, to read this little book by an authority on the subject.

One Smile a Day

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

A LITTLE messenger girl sat opposite me in the subway this afternoon. She looked dragged out, rather, as if the challenge of Springtime hadn't sounded at all for her, and her young lips were set in a hard, straight line. She looked as if life were something of a task—as if even hope and love were wearisome things.

She sat opposite me for nearly fifteen minutes. And though I tried to catch her eye, so that I might smile and nod, her gaze, unwinkingly steady with the odd steadiness of utter fatigue, remained fastened on the car wall, high above my head. And just as I had made up my mind to cross the aisle and speak with her, the car swung to a jerking standstill, and she rose quite suddenly and was lost in the crowd. And I don't think I will ever see her again, for the city, with its population of three millions, holds a great many weary little shopgirls.

I see every day some smileless folk. Perhaps it's in an office building, or on the street, or in the trolley cars, or in house windows, that I see them. And sometimes, if I smile at them quickly—so quickly that I take them by surprise—they'll look a bit happier, maybe, and smile back at me.

It's a mighty pleasant feeling to know that you've made somebody smile. It gives you a warm sensation around the heart—it makes the world seem rosy-bright. It makes strange people look like—friends.

THERE was once, not so very long ago, an old lady who was called by her friends "a shut-in." She lived in a little house on the main highway, a house that stood quite near the dusty road, and every day, in the early morning, she would ask to be wheeled to the window so that she might watch the passers-by. It was her only diversion and amusement.

To a Girl in the Subway

LITTLE girl with the sad, sad eyes,
And the wistful look on your too old face;
Little girl, you are out of place
In this crowded car. Where the wild bird flies
And the winds sweep up to the open skies—
There should you be, in a boundless space,
Where life is more than a weary race,
And youth is a dream that never dies!

Sad, sad eyes and a wistful glance,
Child, there is still a song to sing!
Life is hopeful and sweet and true,
Touched with color and young romance. . . .
Little girl, if I could but bring
The ghost of a smile to the eyes of you!

"It's like reading a book," she said to me once. "An exciting book with new thrills and new situations in every chapter. Every day is a new chapter to me.

"There are folk who go by regularly—business men on their way to town, and women starting out to work in some office, and little children skipping happily to school. They're more than just unknown people now, for they smile and nod to me every time that they go by. The little children throw kisses sometimes."

I OFTEN thought of the shut-in old lady who sat in her window and read the book of life that the main highway spread out for her eyes. I could see, in imagination, her eager face pressed against the pane. And then, one day, came the news that she was dead. And I knew, with a sharp pang at my heart, that the little window would now be dimly empty, and the book of life would go unread.

It must have been a year later that I went to a tea in a distant city and met a remarkable girl. She was just beginning to make good in story-writing and her eyes held the glad, self-surprised light of one who has snatched success from the very arms of failure. Because her work was in a line with my own, we presently found ourselves talking together, seated on a corner divan, isolated from the rest of the people.

"Then," I said, breaking into the conversation after a long pause, "you had a hard time arriving? You really did meet discouragement?"

"Indeed I did!" answered the girl, emphatically. "I was just about ready to give up a year ago. If it hadn't been for my little old lady——"

"Your little old lady?" I questioned. "That sounds as if it might be a story!"

"It is a story," answered the girl—"an unfinished story. Some day I'm going to find out the end of it." She hesitated for a moment and then went on.

"Every morning, last year," she told me, "I started off, a portfolio of work under my arm, to the city. I was suffering under the delusion that I might sell some of it.

"I had a long walk to the station over a dusty road. It seemed as if I spent most of my time stepping aside to let motors pass. There weren't many houses along the road (a farmhouse or two set far back, maybe), and so, aside from the vehicles, it was a lonely walk. It wasn't until one day, when I happened to turn my head to one side to avoid a cloud of dust, that I saw a small house set very close to the path. In the window I saw a little old lady who smiled, as she caught my glance, and nodded to me.

"The next morning she smiled, and the next, and the next. It got so that the morning wasn't complete without her wordless greeting. And because she seemed interested in me (and nobody else, up to that time, had been) my work began to brighten up.

"It's optimism that people want. As soon as my work began to be happier I began to sell it. And then I had a big offer, and I came here to live.

"I never knew the little old lady. She seemed set apart from the rest of us workaday folk. And in the hurry of leaving I never did get to meet her. I don't know who or what she was, or why she sat there. So my story is unfinished. . . ."

Sitting there, on the isolated divan, I told her, with tears in my eyes, the rest of the story!

WE are living, now, in a troubled time. War is with us—war that brings the fear and pain of parting and giving and renouncing. And it isn't as easy to smile as it has been. And for just that reason, every smile that we give means a hundred times as much as it formerly did.

And so I'm going to ask you, friends of mine, to try to bring one smile a day to some soul who, maybe, hasn't the courage to smile. You needn't limit yourself to one smile—if you can make ten, twenty, fifty people smile, so much the better. But be sure, at least, of that one smile!

The little old lady didn't know that she was making the way possible for a genius—that she was bringing a gift of God out of obscurity into the light. But that's what she did when she made the writer-girl's work worth while.

We don't know, any more than the little old lady did, when we give our smiles, just how much good we may be doing. Sometimes a smile, given at the right time, is worth almost as much as a word of understanding, or a loving hand, or a bit of helpful advice. And sometimes the smile that isn't given may be the weight of lead to help crush some one.

The little girl in the subway disappeared into the crowd before I could show her that I wanted to be friendly. Don't let your opportunities to bring cheer disappear, as she did, into oblivion.

Maxfer means economy. Economy means success. 12,000 merchants, farmers and business men have proven that the Maxfer saves them money in their delivery from day to day, week to week, and month to month.

Maxfer makes a Ford, used or new, into a one-ton truck at $350 and a Ford. The Maxfer does not change the Ford in any way; does not cut off rear axles; does not cut off the frame, and when the Ford is converted into a Maxfer one-ton truck, it makes the most economical truck for hauling and delivery ever produced. Our records show that a single Maxfer truck saves money in comparison with the cost of one-horse or two-horse delivery.

The Maxfer has been tested and tried by the largest merchants and business men who have the delivery problem to solve and in every instance it has shown the way to lower costs. Can you afford to use horse delivery when the Maxfer trucks will deliver your merchandise to your customers every day at less money than it is costing you at the present time?

Questions and Answers

S. C., Arlington, Mass. 1. What Scriptural references are there to substantiate the current belief that Christ is at the right hand of God in Heaven? 2. Please explain Heb. 6:4, 5, 6 and its doctrine, compared to that taught in the parable of the Prodigal Son.

1. Apart from the passage in Acts 7:55, 56, describing Stephen's vision, there are the following: Matt. 26:64, where Christ himself prophesies it; the account in Mark 16:19, and the testimony of Paul in Eph. 1:20. There are also the Old Testament visions, such as that in Ps. 91, and others. 2. The apostle is referring to those who, having once seen the beauties, experienced the comfort and tasted the delights of the Gospel, have willingly turned away and desired to stay apart. For these there is no help; but the prodigal son is not of that class. He longed to get back; he wanted to return and, of his own volition, did return. And for him the door was open.

Reader, Chillicothe, Ohio. We cannot engage in speculation as to which of the cults you mention is doing the most harm. But why trouble about them at all? Christ said: "He that is not with me is against me" (Matt. 12:30). Every cult, denomination or sect that does not give all glory to God is against Christ, and is therefore beyond the pale of Christian recognition and concern. If God be not with it and in it, no movement can stand; if it be of God, it will go on, despite opposition.

A. C. N., Jacksonville, Fla. Since the support of the church and its ministry is necessary, and since very many members of a church can only be seen at their leisure on Sunday afternoons, and cannot come during the week, there does not seem to be anything unseemly in appointing a Sunday afternoon for visiting members to receive pledges for dues and benevolences. Let us not forget that we are not under the law any more, but are now free under the Gospel freedom.

R. T., Bordentown, N. J. The carnal man, led by bodily appetites, and with a vain self-sufficiency and a spirit that is quite estranged from the divine life, is too closely akin to the "earthly" to find an interest in spiritual things. The Gospel message to him is "foolishness;" he seeks wisdom at the worldly fountains. Only those who are Spirit-taught can comprehend spiritual truths. This is what is conveyed in I Cor. 2:14; but the passage should be read and studied in connection with the preceding verses on the same subject.

Reader, Philadelphia, Pa. There is no question that the high cost of living would be felt much less of a hardship if the average man and woman were disposed to cut out many needless expenditures. To what astonishing figures indulgence in luxuries—some of them absolutely pernicious—may go, is shown in this little tabulation of the leading luxuries: Tobacco, $1,200,000,000 a year; jewelry, $600,000,000; confectionery, $200,000,000; chewing gum, $13,000,000; liquors, $2,200,000,000; a total from these five alone of $3,613,000,000. And there are many others that might be added to the list.

R. E. B., Underwood, N. D. In apostolic days the same question you ask was troubling the minds of serious men. In James 4:1-3 the answer is given. As to your other questions, the events to which they refer are now things of the past, and discussion would be unavailing.

Mrs. L. G. D., Seattle, Wash., writes: "In reading the question in a recent issue, 'What is the greatest thing to look forward to in 1917?' I asked myself, 'What is most needed?' I know of no other than the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. We should not only watch and eagerly wait for him, but it is our privilege to hasten his return. This we can do, first by fulfilling the Master's command given in Matt. 24:14, and then by praying for it. Prayer is the power that moves the arm of God. He works as we pray. Ours is the promise, 'Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name that will I do.' If it is our privilege to bring deliverance to a world in distress, can we afford to neglect the opportunity? If because of our indifference his coming is delayed, will not the sorrow of earth's millions be laid to our charge? Let us pray as never before: 'Thy Kingdom come.'"

R. E. C., West Finley, Pa. 1. The divine attitude towards man, from the fall to the flood, can best be learned from the Scriptures themselves. It was a world of increasing crime and guilt, and after much long suffering and forbearance (see Gen. 6:5-7) it was overtaken in its sins. 2 and 3. These questions are purely controversial, and discussion would lead to no results.

J. T. L., Sandy Lake, Pa. There are many professing Christian people who have the form of godliness but lack the spirit. Instead of actively associating themselves in practical Christian work, they live a kind of lukewarm, make-believe life, and never seem to realize that Christianity is not a state of indolent indulgence but one of active effort, which gives zest and purpose to life.

F. J. H., Eldorado, Kan. Please explain Dan. 2:34, 35, and 2:44, 45.

The stone described here as being cut without hands, that smote the image and filled the whole earth, is that same stone of stumbling which is referred to in Isa 8:14, the cornerstone, Eph. 2:20, which is emblematic and descriptive of the Kingdom of Christ. This same Kingdom, first described as a stone, then as a mountain, shall in time break up and destroy all images and other stones, and will itself last forever.

J. H. P., Roxobel, N. C. The lines are from Oliver Goldsmith's "The Hermit," stanza 8:

> "Man wants but little here below,
> Nor wants that little long."

Young's "Night Thoughts," written one hundred years later, contains these lines:

> "Man wants but little, nor that little long;
> How soon must he resign his very dust,
> Which frugal nature lent him for an hour!"

M. P. V., Brooklyn. We can suggest no better use to make of your copies of the Christian Herald, after being read by you and your household, than the distribution of them in your own neighborhood.

Mrs. A. H., Occidental, Calif. It is a slang phrase, used in various forms, the commonest to our knowledge being: "Better a has-been than a never-was."

C. R. T., Pittsburg, Pa. What you call "impure statues and pictures" opens a wide field too indefinite for discussion other than the most general. The purity or impurity depends not only upon the predominating motive, but also upon the attitude of the viewer. In any work of art, what the individual sees is largely that which he brings to it within himself. It reflects back to one the image that is uppermost in one's own mind. The pure will see only purity where the vulgar will see only vulgarity. The menace of such works of art in public places is mostly to the young, whose moral natures are not sufficiently formed to guard them against evil suggestiveness. For this reason, even the most nobly conceived statues and pictures, if open to this possibility, should be excluded from the public. There are, of course, many so-called works of art the only motive and purpose of which is immoral appeal. For such there is no defense anywhere. They are unfit for the view of decent people, either in public or in private.

Mrs. H. H. D., Wheaton, Minn. We know of no better help for a Sunday school teacher of a Bible class, aside from the usual Quarterly helps, than the two volumes, "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered," and "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," published by the Christian Herald at 75 cents each.

E. M. P. inquires: "Can a child of God sin past forgiveness?" Positively, no, if there is sincere desire for forgiveness, for we are assured that He is able and willing to save "to the uttermost." Absolute inward assurance of forgiveness is to be obtained by sincere repentance, full surrender to God in prayer, without any reservation and with full faith in his promises. The clearness and degree of this assurance are in accordance with our desire and faith.

Mrs. S. P., St. Jo, Texas. You are searching the Bible assiduously for a particular passage. There is an old story, that used to be in McGuffey's School Reader, of a wise father who called his sons to his deathbed and told them that there was rich treasure buried somewhere on the farm that he was leaving to them. The sons dug and dug over every foot of the farm, deeper and deeper; and while they never found the looked-for treasure, the farm by their digging became wondrously enriched and fertile. Perhaps this was the treasure the wise old man meant. And in searching the Bible for certain passages of Scripture, though we may never find them in the form we are seeking, we do find them in essence and are rewarded in wondrous enrichment of the mind and spirit. Search of the Bible is never in vain. We find more than we realize.

Mrs. A. W., Valley Ford, Calif. Relation between the moon's phases and the planting of crops is a mere superstition, traditionally descending, no doubt, from ancient times in which there was no way of marking the advance of the seasons except by the changes of the moon.

Mrs. H. S., Marion, Ohio. Moving picture shows are neither to be wholly approved nor wholly condemned. Some are good and some are bad. The moving picture, wisely devised and properly presented, is a ready and powerful influence for good. Churches and Sunday schools are taking up this vivid method of presentation of truth. The general tone of the public "movie" shows is improving steadily, but is still deplorably low.

Miscellaneous Answers. Billy Sunday has announced that his entire income from the New York campaign, exclusive of expenses, will be equally divided between the Red Cross and the Army Y. M. C. A.—James Joseph Tissot, painter of the Scriptural pictures, was born in 1836 and died in 1902.—The tabernacle of the Israelites was a movable tent, having a wooden framework and a covering of tapestries and skins.

Richard Johnson of Blue Springs, Neb., first subscribed for the Christian Herald thirty-three years ago. Practically a whole generation has come and gone since he read his first copy, and with him, as with many thousands of others, reading the Christian Herald has become a fixed habit, for he now writes: "I feel I cannot do without it." Doubtless there are many who have been reading the paper steadily for thirty years or more, and have felt it to be increasingly helpful. From the beginning its mission has been one of practical Christian service; and this, together with the fact that its theological platform is broad enough to appeal to all denominations, is what assures it a welcome in so many homes.

A. H., Concordia, Mo. We need not quarrel with the honest belief and conviction of any denomination and its adherents. If they feel inclined to formulate a belief based on the Scriptures and not opposed to Christianity in any vital sense, they have not only a right to do so, but in addition, their beliefs and convictions must be respected.

L. W. M., Jackson, Tenn. Very few enlightened persons consider life insurance morally wrong. It gives a just return upon the investment, and is an excellent means of saving.

C. F., Richmond, Ind. A "call" to a Christian is a strong impulse, sometimes heightened by exalted faith. Every Christian should experience "calls," and many of them. There is constant "call" to service. It should be an everyday experience. We are all "called of God," or "called of the Lord," and happy are they who obey the call, for acceptance means salvation and unceasing service. Many young men experience a "call" to the ministry, which impulse is not different from that which urges other young men to other occupations, and is often misinterpreted. There is a familiar story of a young man who consulted his bishop, saying he was always confronted by the letters "P C," "P C," seemingly in fire, and that they meant to him "Preach Christ," "Preach Christ." The good bishop sounded the young man's abilities and kindly suggested that the "P C" in this case must mean "Plow Corn." But there can be no mistaking the call to acceptance of Christ and to constant daily service with mind and heart and hands. Paul was a striking illustration of God's sovereignty in choosing his instrument. So is the divine will that all should serve to the uttermost. If there are to-day any especially "chosen" above other Christians, they may be known only by their works.

Jesus Betrayed and Denied

International Sunday School Lesson for June 3
John 18:1-18

By GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

JOHN gives the closing scenes in the life of Christ in a very vivid manner. See that the boys and girls in your class visualize these pictures. First, the garden of Gethsemane at night, Jesus praying in the midnight stillness, the disciples sleeping, when the betrayer and his escort come with torches and weapons. Then, still later, verging on the time of cock-crowing, the scene in the courtyard of the high priest's dwelling, the soldiers around the fire, the coming and going of officers and messengers to the Roman governor. Then in the morning, the growing crowd around the portico of Pilate's palace. (See Evangelist Sunday's sermon on "The Three Groups" in the Christian Herald of May 2, page 512.)

The Riddle of Judas

Some of the most difficult problems of character center in the personality of the betrayer. Naturally, the early church soon made him appear utterly bad from the beginning, and made his pictured face crafty and hard in every Gospel painting. Yet Jesus selected the twelve after much thought and a night of prayer. It may be that he saw possibilities of good even in the man of Kerioth, who, by the way, seems to have been the only one of the apostles not a Galilean.

Some men have labored to find excuse for Judas's act. They have found nothing. He sinned against friendship, against devoted, tender ministry, against his own pledged loyalty. Nor was he, like Peter, overtaken by sudden weakness. His act was deliberate.

"The love of money" led an apostle to sell his Lord for thirty pieces of silver. Today it will make Christian professors sell out their principles for a few dollars.

Our religion must justify the way in which we get our money as well as the way in which we give it.

On the other hand, it has been deemed by some students that Judas was influenced by disappointment and jealousy. He had expected, perhaps, success and power through the work of the Messiah—a seat by his throne at Jerusalem. As he finally realized that nothing of the sort was to occur, he decided to "get what he could out of it." Also to "get even" with the rest.

Remember the bitterness of his remorse.

The Scene in the Garden

John leaves out the story of the agony and the prayer, of the way in which Jesus faced the cross and conquered it in advance. He lays instead a powerful emphasis on the Saviour's composure and majesty as he faced the soldiers. The crafty priests were afraid to take Jesus prisoner by day. They feared the people and the tumult. Jesus was very righteously angry with the miserable creatures who held the high positions in the temple of God. "Are ye come out as against a bandit, with swords and staves to seize me? I was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took me not."

There is something wrong when the authorities have to do their work under cover of darkness. What we are ashamed to do openly is pretty certain to be some form of treason to God.

"When he said unto them, I am he, they went backward and fell to the ground." Such is the power of unarmed righteousness.

"Let These Go"

In this critical hour, Jesus' one concern was for the safety of others. "If therefore ye seek me, let these go their way." Not a thought for self; careful planning for his friends.

The last seen of William T. Stead, that Christlike Christian of our times, he was on the boat-deck of the sinking Titanic, carefully putting a little child into the boat with her mother. It never even occurred to him to try to save himself.

Jesus' effort to shield the disciples was almost thwarted by Peter's rash action. The same old impulsive blunderer! He had a talent for doing or saying the wrong thing.

What mistakes we all make, even when we try to be loyal! We think we can defend Jesus with blows, or help his cause by means that he would not approve.

"Put up thy sword." Our weapons must be spiritual. His kingdom is not to be advanced by force.

The Scene at the High Priest's Court

This time the temple police do not return empty-handed as they had once before (John 7 : 45). Elated, they bring him to the waiting Annas and Caiaphas, who were ready to hold a secret inquiry at once. The whole procedure, with its attempts to shift responsibility from priests to Pilate, from Pilate to Herod and back again, only took twelve hours or so. Jesus was hurried to his death, illegally.

But to us the central figures are not the jealous, hateful priests, but the two lone friends of Jesus, disciples very much like ourselves. One was acquainted with the high priest and yet dared to enter in and even to use his influence to gain admittance for the other (verse 16). But the second, Peter, was not so daring. The maid-servant who kept the door tauntingly asked him if he too was a follower of Jesus, and Peter hastily said, "I am not."

Peter in the Firelight

It is a memorable picture, that rugged fisherman out of his element, ill at ease in an ecclesiastical court, standing with the enemies of his Lord whom he loved, warming himself at their fire. He had made a bad start with his lie at the door. You can hardly call it a denial; at first it was a falsehood. But the direct challenge by the fire was his last chance to suffer with Jesus. Angrily, bitterly, with oaths, he denied that he had ever known him.

This was the man who had declared himself ready to die with his friend!

We must put ourselves in Peter's place. It is one thing to be ready to fight. It is quite another to stand in the presence of mocking courtiers and be able to say the dignified and fitting thing.

We trip just as he did. Our denials are due to moral cowardice, not to physical fear. Men who would not flinch in the trenches are ashamed to stand up for Jesus in "good society." Boys who are good athletes find it hard to withstand a little teasing about being Sunday school scholars; there is one of the chief reasons we lose so many at the age of fifteen or sixteen. Bring the case of Peter home to the young fellows in your school and class.

The Scene in Pilate's Palace

Pilate is perplexed by the unworldliness and calm of the prisoner and the bitterness of the priestly accusers. A dreamer this, with his talk about a Kingdom of Truth; but why the determination for his blood?

Pilate, being a Roman, hates to put a man to death who is manifestly innocent of any harm. Being a politician, he wants to conciliate the accusers also. Hence his cruel and unjust order for the bloody scourging as a sop to their hatred. But he did not realize the extent of their vindictiveness. They cried the more, "Crucify him! Crucify him!"

With a guilty conscience, with an outraged sense of decency, he dallies with them instead of taking his stand with law and fair play. Therefore he had to submit to their threat to bring charges against Jesus before the suspicious, hasty Emperor Tiberius. To please the high dignitaries of the Jews, he orders the execution of the Man who had so profoundly impressed him.

Don't Inflict a Truss Upon Your Child

GROWING children need a great amount of care and attention. Especially is this true when the child is unfortunate enough to be ruptured. But the parent who harnesses a ruptured child with a truss is inflicting an injustice.

Trusses seldom fit well. Spring trusses are dangerous. No truss can be comfortably worn in bed. Most trusses are conspicuous. Few of them are uninjured by water.

The Brooks Rupture Appliance has none of the drawbacks of a truss. It is especially adapted for wear by children because it is made to the individual measure of the wearer. It rests flat and smooth, and its soft cushion adheres to the flesh, making slipping impossible. This cushion is always cool and comfortable, owing to a constant circulation of air.

SENT ON TRIAL

To convince you of the great comfort and relief which your child will obtain from the Brooks Rupture Appliance, we shall be glad to send you one on free trial. If you are not entirely satisfied, we will cheerfully refund your money. You may deal with us with the knowledge that you are receiving the care and attention of a sanitarium. We are not a factory.

The Brooks Rupture Appliance has the endorsement of the country's leading physicians. Thousands of happy wearers daily sing its praises.

The Sunday School Lesson

"What shall I do with Jesus, which is called Christ?" He wanted to do nothing. But with this question before a man, there is no possiblity of neutrality. Whether we like it or not, a decision is forced upon us. We must be for him or against him when the day of testing comes. Pilate stood for one hour in the spotlight of history. He might have been a Christian hero! Simply by doing his duty as a judge!

Superintendent's Talk to the School

Golden Text: "He was despised and rejected of men." Isa. 53 : 3.

BIBLE scholars tell us that Isaiah drew his picture of the Suffering Servant of God from what he knew of the Prophet Jeremiah. For Jeremiah was hated, misrepresented, imprisoned, plotted against. Afterward he was honored as a mighty speaker for Jehovah.

Every schoolboy knows that the world has always been making these blunders. It put Columbus in prison, and tortured Galileo for finding out the truth about the stars. John Bunyan, writer of Pilgrim's Progress, spent years in jail. "Seven cities claimed blind Homer dead, through which the living Homer begged his bread." Paul wore chains. Even Jesus, the Divine Redeemer, was crucified.

All of this teaches us that there will be times when we will be looked down upon and misrepresented if we are loyal to him. The Master himself said that it was the last and best of all Beatitudes to be persecuted for righteousness' sake. "Rejoice and leap for joy" if you have a chance to suffer with the pioneers and prophets, with the saints and the Saviour himself. "If so be that we suffer with him, we may be also glorified with him."

Now, are we going to be ashamed of being Christ's followers, like Peter in the firelight? Or are we going to "stand up, stand up for Jesus?"

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

What to Do on Decoration Day Sunday

THE year 1917 and this Decoration Sunday is an especially favorable time to emphasize loyalty to the ideals of this nation. The past and the present link up in this Decoration Day.

Advertise the Day. Use the local paper in setting out in attractive manner the plans for the school's observance of the day. Send home by the scholars an invitation to unite in the celebration of the day at the Sunday school.

Decorate the school. Every one should be urged to wear some personal flag decoration. In addition, the flag should be hoisted from the school flagpole or from the school windows. In the interior, America's flag, the Red Cross flag, the Christian flag, should all be displayed, and the flags of France, England, Italy, Japan, Russia and other nations allied with the United States. The World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York, upon application will send for five cents a booklet giving in colors the flags of all nations. These booklets give some interesting Sunday school information about these nations.

The school walls should be decorated with pictures of Washington, Lincoln and President Wilson, and if possible with patriotic quotations from their addresses.

Program. This will include a salute to the national flag by holding the flag aloft and extending the right hand toward it, while all say:

"I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the Republic for which it stands: one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

The salute to the Christian flag should follow: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the Saviour for whose kingdom it stands; one brotherhood, uniting all nations in service and love."

Of course "America," the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," and the "Star-Spangled Banner" will be sung. It is of the first importance that the story of the writing of each hymn should be told by the boys and girls. Many do not know the circumstances that gave birth to these hymns. For instance: "America" was sung for the first time at Park Street Church, Boston. Edward Everett Hale was passing the church as other boys were marching in. He joined them and with the others sang "America." Samuel F. Smith was present. He was the author of the hymn. He was a young theological student then, and later became a clergyman and author and a lover of missions. He wrote "The Morning Light Is Breaking."

Why would it not be a good plan to promote international good-fellowship by having the "Marseillaise" sung, or some other of the national hymns of the nations in alliance with America?

The Gettysburg Address. This should be read on Memorial Sunday by one of the best elocutionists in the school.

Recognition of Soldiers. If there are any veterans of the war in the audience, they should be brought in by the Boys' Brigade or Boy Scouts and given places of honor. And those of the school membership who are enlisting should be mentioned by name, special messages should be sent them by the school, and they should be prayed for by name.

"No, it isn't in the least like quitting, or running away," supplied John Denby, reading unerringly his son's hesitation. "You're not quitting at all. I'm asking you to go. Indeed, I'm begging you to go, Burke. I want you. I need you. I'm not an old man, I know; but I feel like one. These last two years have not been—er—a bed of roses for me, either." In spite of a certain lightness in his words, the man's voice shook a little. "I don't think you know, boy, how your old dad has—missed you."

"Don't I? I can guess." Burke wheeled and resumed his nervous stride. The words, as he flung them out, were at once a challenge and an admission. "But—Helen—" He stopped short, waiting.

"I've answered that. I've told you. Helen needs a rest and a change."

Again to the distraught husband's ears came the echo of a woman's wailing—"Maybe you think I ain't tired of working and pinching and slaving—"

"Then you don't think Helen will feel that I'm running away?" A growing hope was in his eyes, but his brow still carried its frown of doubt.

"Not if she has a check for—ten thousand dollars," replied John Denby, a bit grimly.

Burke winced. A painful red reached his forehead.

"It is, indeed, a large sum, sir,—too large," he resented, with sudden stiffness. "Thank you; but I'm afraid we can't accept it, after all."

John Denby saw his mistake at once; but he did not make the second mistake of showing it.

"Nonsense!" he laughed lightly, with no sign of the sudden panic of fear within him lest the look on his son's face meant the downfall of all his plans. "I made it large purposely. Remember, I'm borrowing her husband for a season; and she needs some recompense! Besides, it'll mean a playday for herself. You'll not be so unjust to Helen as to refuse her the means to enjoy that!—not that she'll spend it all for that, of course. But it will be a comfortable feeling to know that she has it."

"Y-yes, of course," hesitated Burke, still frowning.

"Then we'll call that settled."

"I know; but— Of course if you put it that way, why, I—"

Fifty Diseases Traceable to Stomach Acidity

By R. W. LOCKWOOD

Stomach acidity and fermentation so universally prevalent, when neglected are responsible for over fifty serious illnesses, according to Eugene Christian, the well-known food scientist.

Troubles which seemingly have no connection with the stomach are in reality caused in 90% of all cases by the failure of the digestive tract to properly assimilate the foods we eat. As someone has said, the stomach is the seat of all ailments.

Constipation followed by auto-intoxication, biliousness, malnutrition, obesity, heart, liver, and kidney affections, is in a surprising number of cases due entirely to stomach acidity and fermentation caused by wrong eating.

So ill-chosen are our daily foods that we not only fail many times to benefit by their brain and body-building elements, but are also unable to properly and regularly eliminate the waste.

The dangerous body poisons which are formed as a consequence seep into the blood and gradually lower our efficiency, sap our vitality, and rush a great many of us to an early death. Eugene Christian, the noted food specialist, says the fact that the average American dies at 43 is due more to wrong food combinations than to any other cause.

This question of proper food combinations is the most important in the field of eating. Very often one food of great value in itself, when eaten in combination with another equally good food, produces a chemical reaction in the stomach and literally explodes. Is it any wonder then that so few of us are more than 50% efficient in our daily lives, that we accomplish just about one-half the tasks which we set out to do, and see so many of our fine ambitions crumble to dust?

But just as wrong food combinations cause sickness, so do right combinations prevent and correct it by removing the cause. If we will give Nature half a chance, she will do her share toward producing the results for which we are striving, as Eugene Christian is proving for hundreds of men and women today.

I have been told that a number of wealthy people who have gone to him after everything else had failed have been so happy at their complete restoration to health through his simple suggestions that they have voluntarily sent him checks for from $500 to $1,000 in addition to his regular charge.

So much interest has been displayed throughout the country in the results of corrective eating that Eugene Christian has written a set of 24 Little Lessons for the use of the thousands of people unable to call at his office.

These Little Lessons, which are sent for examination to any one on request, contain the boiled down experience of Eugene Christian's twenty years' study of foods and their relation to health and efficiency, and give actual menus covering every condition of health and sickness, for every age and for all seasons, climates, and occupations.

The letters received by Eugene Christian from users of these lessons telling their experiences with Corrective Eating are as startling as they are full of interest.

Just the other day he received a letter from Mr. I. J. Ayres, head of an insurance agency in Hutchins, Texas, who wrote: "My health began to fail about one year ago. Up to this time I had enjoyed reasonably good health all my life—am 58 years old. I had, however, been troubled with constipation nearly all my life. My health grew worse and I lost in weight from 140 to 120 pounds. When I began using the Little Lessons I began to improve from the first, and now for months I have felt better than I have for years past, and am completely cured of constipation. My restoration to health is due to the Little Lessons in Scientific Eating."

Another letter of interest just received is from a prominent Manchester, New Hampshire, man. He writes: "At the time I sent for the Little Lessons I was troubled with a very bad acid stomach, fermentation, etc. My stomach pained me as badly as any ulcerated tooth. After receiving them (the lessons) I followed directions and in about ten days the pain grew less. In two weeks I was free from pain. Gradually I grew stronger, also gaining weight. Weight was 112—now 130. Last June it was an effort for me to walk one mile. Since last November I have been in the woods almost daily hunting and walking from four to fifteen miles per day." And he says "the lessons did it."

Another interesting letter is from the head of a manufacturing concern in Fillmore, New York, who writes: "I was troubled with fermentation and constipation, had to take something every day to move my bowels, my weight was normal, but I had no strength. I followed your directions and am much better. Do not take any laxatives—bowels move every day and am much stronger."

These are only a few, but they are typical of letters that come almost every day from users of the Little Lessons. Truly these lessons are doing a remarkable work in putting Eugene Christian's scientific knowledge of food in the hands of so many thousands of sufferers throughout the country.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with this great food specialist, because every point is so thoroughly covered and so clearly explained that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will help to produce the increased physical and mental energy which you are seeking the day you receive the lessons. And you are quite likely to feel some results after your very first balanced meal.

If you would like to examine the 24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, simply write the Corrective Eating Society, Inc., Dept. 345, 450 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely ask to have the lessons mailed for five days' trial with the understanding that you will either send the small price asked, $3, or remail the books. Merely clip out and mail the following form instead of writing a letter, as this is a copy of the official blank adopted by the Society and will be honored at once.

"Well, I do put it just that way," nodded the father lightly. "Now, let's go in. I've got some maps and time-tables I want you to see. I'm planning a different route from the one we took with the doctor—a better one, I think. But let's see what you say. Come!" And he led the way to the library.

BURKE'S head came up alertly. His shoudlers lost their droop and his brow its frown. A new light flamed into his eyes and a new springiness leaped into his step. Always, from the time his two-year-old lips had begged to "see the wheels go round," had Burke's chief passion and delight been traveling. As he bent now over the maps and time-tables that his father spread before him, voice and hands fairly trembled with eagerness. Then suddenly a chance word sent him to his feet again, the old look of despair on his face.

"Dad, I can't," he choked. "I can't be a quitter. You don't want me to be!"

With a sharp word John Denby, too, leaped to his feet. Something of the dogged persistence that had won for him wealth and power glowed in his eyes as he went straight to his son and laid both hands on his shoulders.

"Burke, I had not meant to say this," he began quietly; "but perhaps it's just as well that I do. Possibly you think I've been blind all these past months; but I haven't. I've seen—a good deal. Now I want you and Helen to be happy. I don't want to see your life—or hers—wrecked. I believe there's a chance yet for you two people to travel together with some measure of peace and comfort, and I'm trying to give you that chance. There's just one thing to do, I believe, and that is—to be away from each other for a while. You both need it. For weeks I've been planning and scheming how it could be done. How do you suppose I happened to have this Alaska trip all cut and dried even down to the train and boat schedules, if I hadn't done some thinking? Tonight came my chance. So I spoke."

"But—to be a quitter!"

"You're not quitting. You're—stopping to get your breath."

"There's—my work."

"You've made good, and more than good there, son. I've been proud of you—every inch of the way. You're no quitter there."

"Thanks, dad!" Only the sudden mist in his eyes and the shake in his voice showed how really moved Burke was. "But—Helen!" he stammered then.

"Will be better off without you—for a time."

"And—I?"

"Will be better off without her—for the same time. While I—shall be, oh, so infinitely better off with you. Ah, son, but I've missed you so!" It was the same longing cry that had gone straight to Burke's heart a few minutes before. "You'll come?"

To Save Syria's Dying Millions

A SPECIAL correspondent of "As Sayeh" (New York) recently portrayed, in the following graphic sentences, the conditions in Syria:

"What can I say about Syria, other than it is a land over which the angel of death seems to hover permanently? It is impossible to describe the conditions there, for if I were to tell you of things as they are, my pen would refuse to move and my heart faint. Death is using Syria as a plaything throughout the length and breadth of the land."

And Syria is only one part of the great problem of relief of war-made misery. Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness and those who looked were healed. As Christ walked through the paths of Galilee, those were healed who touched His garment.

American Christianity stands today as the representative of Christ, and to it millions of suffering, hungering people stretch forth their hands seeking but to touch the hem of His garment, craving the healing touch of His mercy. Daily they die, old people—mothers—children. Disease, starvation, exposure, take their daily toll. We in America have given, we are giving, but we must give more and still more, and yet again—more.

FISK
TIRES

THE life work and product of an old and trustworthy manufacturing institution which has enjoyed from its beginning the well-deserved reputation of being "the best concern to work for, and the squarest to do business with."

There has never been any mystery about Fisk methods or Fisk quality. When you use Fisk Tires, you learn more tire satisfaction—more real dollar-for-dollar tire value, than you can get in any other make.

Buy at least one pair of Fisk Tires and put them to a comparative test—that is the quickest, easiest and most inexpensive way of learning Fisk Quality.

"When you pay more than Fisk prices you pay for something that does not exist."

A natural development of the Fisk Policy of Tire Satisfaction is Fisk FREE Tire Service at more than 125 Direct Fisk Branches throughout the country. Real Tire Service is given FREE to All Motorists, whether Fisk Tires are used or not. There are no obligations. A PASS IN GLACIER NATIONAL PARK, WHERE THE FIBRE OF OUR NATIONAL SPIRIT IS TYPIFIED IN RUGGED PEAKS, EVER-RUSHING TORRENTS AND A WIDE HORIZON

Art Thou the Man?

Do the Shades of Destruction, Injury and Death Haunt Your Conscience?

Or from Others' Faults, Do They Rise Before You—Warning You For Safety

Each day rings up an increasing toll of motor accidents —preventable accidents—accidents caused by motor cars skidding. And for every such accident, some man's carelessness was responsible. Art thou the man?

From these accidents, financial loss has resulted, with injury and suffering to human beings. Death too has often followed—irreparable, irrevocable death—with all the sorrows and trials and hardships that death brings to the bereaved ones. And all because some one man thought he was immune—carelessly indifferent to the accident-preventing value of Tire Chains. Art thou the man?

Someone was responsible for each accident from skidding. Whether the car that skidded—smashed, maimed or killed its own occupants or crashed into another car, mutilating or taking the lives of its innocent passengers, the cause was the same—the lack of Tire Chains. It began with some one man's individual carelessness. Art thou the man?

Neither your life, nor the lives of those with you, are safe if your car is not made skidproof with chains when the roads are wet and slippery. And no matter how careful you are, if others fail to safeguard their cars, each such careless driver endangers you and those with you.

EVERY "WEED" IS GUARANTEED

Carelessness is even now arranging the plans for the next accident from skidding. Some certain man is already preparing to be responsible for that accident—

WHERE CIVILIZATION IS STILL YOUNG

How American Educational Methods are Transforming the Savage in the Igorote

BY MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

CAMP Thirty, thirty kilometers north of Baguio, is on the tourist route. From Baguio the mountain trail leads past scenes of majesty and charm, with comfortable rest-houses, good ponies and reliable cargadores, who will carry all any one needs for the trip, to Bontoc, the capital of the Mountain Province, one of the most interesting cities a tourist can visit. From Bontoc one may ride up the steep trail to Sagada, where the American Episcopalians have an important and flourishing work, or to the Banaue valley, where the Ifugao rice terraces reach up to the very peaks of the high hills. The building of the mountain trail has made available to the hurried traveler who can stand a little roughing it the most interesting districts under the flag of the United States.

Our party was not in search of scenery but of schools, which lie in the valleys and not on the mountain ridge along which the mountain trail runs, affording distant views of canyon-like valleys and wooded peaks eight thousand feet high.

Down, down we went through the pines, past magnificent tree ferns, more graceful than palm-trees, whose hard-wood stems make beautiful furniture, to the hot valley where lies the homely little village of Ambuclao. The Stars and Stripes waved gaily over the thatched roofs of the city hall and the small schoolhouse, where we saw half-wild, dirty boys reciting in English. It was a conversation lesson. The teacher, neat and intelligent-looking in his white duck suit, asked one boy of fourteen, "Where is your father?" The answer was so grammatical it almost hurt: "I have no father." The Director of Education, who has a passion for plumbing the minds of his six hundred thousand charges, whispered, "I'd like to ask that boy where his father is."

Later he did so privately, and the answer was, "My father is no more." I was a little surprised that he did not say, "My dad? I ain't got no dad. He kicked the bucket last year."

We spent the night at Bokod, farther up the valley. Here there is a fine school, with neat, bright-faced children in gay costumes, and a dormitory for girls, the money for which was furnished by the despised Igorotes, and the labor for which was voluntary toil, given to aid in a work which was strongly opposed by the Igorotes only a few years ago.

IT is a general conception that the Department of Education in the Philippines has lavished money throughout the Islands, dotting dirty villages with spotless schools and forcing the children to attend. But the reverse is the case. Funds are few; buildings, with the exception of a few show places in the city of Manila and the port cities, are simple and as cheaply constructed as is compatible with durability and usefulness; only one-half of the children of school age can be accommodated, and courses have to be so planned that the people will see the economic advantage of an education and willingly send their children, depriving themselves of their services.

The Philippine schools, with the exception of a few monuments to local civic pride, are more economically housed and administered, more carefully adapted to the needs of the people, more strictly managed, than the mission schools I have seen. The ideas of the central bureau are tested under varying conditions; remarks and suggestions are collected from thousands of teachers, and the work moves on with a precision which comes from the ideal of a practical education for those who need that very thing. But the greatest advantage is that the work is centralized and standardized, a condition which is not true in mission schools and which will have to be before the greatest good can be done with the least expenditure of time, money and effort. Teachers in the Philippines are professionals, chosen for their ability as teachers and not for their piety or willingness to sacrifice. Yet Mr. Marquardt says frankly that unless a school teacher in the Philippines has the missionary spirit he is doomed to failure. A Filipino teacher must be efficient in many lines or lose his position.

One teacher at Bokod not only teaches several classes in the academic courses of the school, but is a good director of music, a skilled instructor in group games and athletics, a practical gardener, and an instructor in basketry that has to be good enough to sell to discerning buyers in Baguio. He is in a small village, where there are very few Filipinos, working among people whom he considers as different from himself as we consider the Filipinos, and he is practically the father of a large family of students, many of whom are living away from their home towns. His pay is less than eighteen dollars a month, and he dresses neatly. His shoes were of an American brand and must have cost him one-third of his month's salary.

Nothing has so impressed me as have the bravery, patience and tact of the young Filipino teachers, many of whom have never entered the seventh grade, who have gone far away from their homes, friends and fellow-countrymen to teach Igorotes or Moros the language of self-advancement and economic fitness. Five years ago it was very difficult to get Filipino boys to pioneer in difficult fields of service, as they are a home-loving people; but now the islands from one end to the other are being taught by mere boys who were themselves untaught a decade ago. The triumph of the American educational work in the Philippines is in the second generation of teachers, those brave brown boys who appear on time before their half-wild charges, clad in immaculate duck suits, neat, erect and manly.

AT Bokod a girl with two years' training can earn twenty-five cents a day weaving pillow covers, table-runners or dress material. The food she eats costs five cents a day. She not only earns money for herself and family in addition to taking a complete academic course, but one-half the proceeds from her labor, turned into the school fund, have already provided the school with a fine phonograph, a good collection of records, and the instruments for a ten-piece stringed orchestra, which turns out music that would compare well with the best that graduates from a New England finishing school could do.

The girls of Bokod make their own dresses. That doesn't mean that they go down to a store, pick out three kinds of cloth, the right kind of thread, a paper pattern, and a package of sewing-machine needles and then slap the thing together until the dressmaker can come and really make something out of the materials so enthusiastically misused. They weave the material themselves and make it into dresses, and in addition send dress materials and finished dresses to other schools where industrial work is more advanced.

At Daklan, the boys were having an English and arithmetic game in conversation. One boy would stand in front of the class and say, "I have here seven sticks. I take away four sticks. How many sticks do I leave?" The answer was an involved example of the way to teach English to second-grade Igorote boys, whose language is not English.

"If you have seven sticks and take away four sticks, you have three sticks left." Every tense, pronoun, and noun correct, two boys taking part, and the teacher almost a bystander. That is English teaching by the conversational method, without memorization of stiff, stilted sentences or long dry lectures on the part of the teacher.

At Daklan half of the students come from a distance of one hour's walk, and forty-nine of the fifty registered for the month were in their seats. There are no truant officers in the Philippines and no compulsory education.

The decorations of the school-rooms are simple but good. Large Perry pictures in wooden frames made by students are used, and the choice of subjects is good. The Horse Fair, The Good Shepherd, Baby Stuart, Christ Blessing Little Children, and The Gleaners give some idea of the pictures these Igorote boys gaze upon in their schools. Is it any hardship or shame that they can't have the Police Gazette or the Sunday Comic Supplement to round out their idea of the beautiful in art? The benches for the Igorote schools are made at the boys' school at Baguio and are durable and cheap.

circuit of six hundred and fifty kilometers of rough riding, green terraces of rice bordered the clear waters of a branch stream. Rows of stooping women were cultivating the growing rice standing in the shallow water and stirring up the mud with sturdy arms. Up on the slope, in the finest house of the district, the Croesus of the Igorotes (who is a Christian) looked out from his window. He was clad in the reddest of sweaters, of which he was inordinately proud, as becomes a man who has risen above the ordinary herd; and as he watched the long rows of women who did his work for him he pronounced the world good. He was right. The world, as seen from the slopes of Lutab, is a scene of peace and contentment, a place where nature smiles and man follows her example. We were in the wilds of Luzon, far from the tourist path.

Yet, high up on the side of the precipitous slopes, the wife of the supervising teacher had her school and dormitory for girls. Her home is a center of refinement and charm. She is not a missionary in the religious sense. She teaches no Bible verses; but she sows sweet smiles on the fertile soil of Igorote childhood and reaps the gratitude of a shy but appreciative race, winning them to higher lives by the power of an enthusiastic and radiant example.

Down in the village, there are thirteen young wives, in better houses than most, weaving neat patterns and helping families to better living conditions because of their years as schoolgirls. Home industry is encouraged by the Bureau of Education, and, instead of herding in factories, weaving woman's lifeblood into the fabric of national commerce, the Filippino woman treads her loom under her own roof, and is able to stop from time to time to croon a song of universal mother love to the pickaninny who plays beside her. Huts are homes, if hearts are there.

KABAYAN is the last town of the Nabalois, second only to the Kalingas among the Igorote tribes for cleanliness; and when we reached Buguias, we found the blanketed figures of the Kankanai schoolboys. They were singing "London Bridge is Broken Down," and as the tune was unfamiliar I had great difficulty in understanding the words. They were singing without understanding what they were singing. But they were getting a start.

From Buguias to Loo, pronounced with two long "o's," the trail is almost a boulevard, paralleling a clear stream of water in which many rapids add charm to the view. At Loo three trails unite, and the rest-house there would make a wonderful place to "set a while." But we pushed on to the schoolhouse, two kilometers farther on, only stopping for coffee, and feed for the ponies. Loo is the most backward district in the Kankanai field, and although the boys were well disciplined and apparently fairly bright, their appearance in white cotton blankets, made out of material resembling grain sacks, was far from prepossessing. Better honest brown skin with the sheen of a horse's neck, than a filthy blanket.

We hit the mountain trail, up on the ridge, at kilometer 97, with ten miles left of our forty-mile ride, for the day. Up, up we went until I was ashamed to ride the small pony farther. At kilometer 102, we took a short cut supposed to cut off three kilometers, but the next sign read 103. Night was setting in, and heavy clouds lay along the ridge which we had left. Giant pine-trees stretched into the air for a hundred and fifty feet, and wild roses scented the air. A backward look showed us the green plain two thousand feet below, where the schoolhouse of Loo was the only sign of habitation in the vast stretch of peaceful land. Two kilometers more of zigzags and we reached the summit of the Mount Data pass, just as daylight died away and the golden moon tipped the opposite height with a flood of light.

Then we went down through the moonlit forest, khaki coats bleaching into white and turning dead black as the travellers rode in and out of the shadows of the pines. We clattered over a wooden bridge, swung out over a bottomless valley, turned a corner, mounted a short path and greeted Professor McElroy and his wife, Governor Eckman and four other people, who were stopping at the tourist hotel called Mount Data rest-house but made a palace of keenest delight by the neat housekeeper and captivating cook.

Heroic Amid Dangers

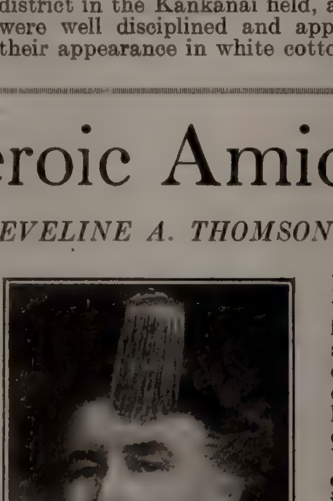
By EVELINE A. THOMSON, Constantinople College

ON THE outskirts of the civilized world, at Constantinople in Turkey, an American college for women, Constantinople College, is still pursuing its normal course, in this the third year of the Great World War. Time after time, disaster in some form or other has seemed to threaten it, but in every instance it has stood firm.

At the outbreak of the Great War in August, 1914, only a few months after it had occupied its present new buildings on the European shore of the Bosphorus, there was considerable anxiety as to the possibility of its opening. But it did open, and its classrooms were more than filled. In the autumn of the same year, when Turkey threw in her lot with the Central Powers, pessimists saw nothing but failure ahead for the College. But as an answer to their fears, it has enrolled more students during these last two years than ever before. A few weeks ago, when relations were broken off between Turkey and the United States, friends of the College thought the work would have to be given up. Again the College has triumphed. Now we learn that it is to remain open, and to continue its beneficent work. 'Latest advices from Constantinople confirm this report and add that the Turkish Government is courteous and friendly.

We have here an unparalleled record of an institution weathering the continuous storms of adverse conditions. It is to-day an island of safety in an ocean of conflicting elements. The 425 students studying at Constantinople College and in its Preparatory School continue their usual activities and their enthusiasm for work has in no way abated. The various nationalities—Turkish, Bulgarian, Greek, Armenian, Hebrew and Albanian—live side by side as they have lived for a generation. In the midst of destruction, they are quietly doing that constructive work which must go on that nations may grow.

Friends of Constantinople College and those who desire a higher and better education for the young women of the Near East, continually ask the question: "How has the war affected the College?" In the first place, the city of Constantinople as well as the whole of the Ottoman Empire has suffered great hardships because of the abnormal prices for food and the shortage of coal and other fuel. To talk of the "high cost of living" seems like an old story these days. Yet our own increased expenditure for food is as nothing compared to that in Constantinople. How the poor can procure subsistence at all, is a mystery. Rice and potatoes and such staples are prohibitive in price. Flour is $100 a barrel and bread forty cents a loaf! The College has been able to buy flour from Bulgaria, and has also been fortunate in obtaining other supplies; but the prices paid for these things have run into thousands of dollars. The consequent deficit for running expenses has been staggering. Last year, a year of abnormal prices, the deficit was $60,000; this year it will be as much as $83,000, although the fees for tuition and board have been raised and the income of the College increased. Our American colleges are the only institutions in the city of Constantinople that have been able to keep open a boarding department, other schools being closed to all but day students. It is difficult to measure the value of the boarding department of the College. To be able to live in the college buildings and have all their wants provided for within its walls, has been an incalculable boon to the students. For this reason, the sacrifice and cost have been amply repaid.



Dr. Mary Mills Patrick

Another effect of the war is that it has made of this American institution a refuge in time of trouble. Armenian students suffering from persecution, needy girls who have lost materially through the hardships of war time, find there a haven. The College has thus become an unofficial and quiet, but none the less valuable, relief center. It has meted out benefits without number to destitute girls. It has banded its inmates together to relieve suffering both in the army and the civil community. Its students and teachers have nursed in the hospitals of Stamboul. Its Christian Association has provided funds and work for the poor of the surrounding villages. In many ways it has stood for humanity, helping all alike, with a fine impartiality.

The College family has been busy devising ingenious methods of economy. To save coal for lighting purposes, students rose at dawn and retired soon after nightfall. Gradually, one thing after another has had to be given up,—no coffee but a strange herb in its place; no tea, no lemons and only a very small portion of sugar per week. During the winter, only certain classrooms were heated.

These are some of the material changes the war has wrought. The moral effect has been equally marked. It has brought out the best in faculty and students,—a spirit of splendid endurance, a patience and an optimism which only pessimists can sneer at. Nothing shows this unshakable confidence better than letters received from the College dean. It must be remembered that very few letters from Constantinople are allowed to get through, and they are therefore confined almost entirely to necessary business. But their continuously cheerful tone is always refreshing. On November 10th, Dean Wallace wrote:—

"The health of the students is excellent. There is an earnest spirit of work and good fellowship. In fact, a teacher who is at the head of our Music Department tells me that when she comes to us from the city each week, our life on the hilltop seems like heaven!"

Again on January 12th: "Food prices are leaping at present but many wise heads prophesy that there will be a drop in the near future."

Another letter, dated February 19th, says: "You probably think much about the College these days and I can assure you that we are getting along beautifully, although our bills are at times staggering."

On March 12th, he writes: "Spring is with us and that always makes one optimistic. The College atmosphere is most cheerful and work and pleasure fill the days to the limit. . . . There is no present need of anxiety."

There are some things of the spirit which the war cannot touch, and it is these which Constantinople College holds more precious than all else. The College is standing to-day for humanity as never before, proclaiming not in words, but in the steady pursuance of its high aims, that America would wish for Turkey and the peoples of the Balkans all these good gifts which she has herself struggled for. To any one passing up the Bosphorus, the four gray stone college-buildings crowning Arnaoutkeuy hill are distinctly visible among the trees. They give a silent testimony, in these trying days, to the best ideals in American life.

The College must go on. It will go on, and survive the most formidable of the storms of war. But it must have funds. The needs are greater than they have been at any other time in the course of its history. These American women in Constantinople are looking to their own country for help, now. Money is needed for current expenses, for an endowment fund, and for new buildings, especially a new dormitory and a new Preparatory School. Americans can help in this emergency, in keeping Constantinople College open and in making this work count for more than ever before in the lives of the people of the Near East.

TREASURER SAMUEL T. DUTTON, of the American College for Girls at Constantinople, writes to the Christian Herald acknowledging a recent gift of $2,000 for the institution. He says: "I can assure you that the generous gift of the Christian Herald for the relief of girls connected with the Constantinople College is highly appreciated, not only by myself as treasurer, but by the members of the Board of Trustees, to whom I shall give information of your action. It was most encouraging to us to get a telegram yesterday through the Department of State, stating that the American colleges in Constantinople are going on as usual, and that the Turkish officials are very courteous. This means a great deal, not only for the college and its faculty, but for this particular branch of the work for which you are contributing, namely, the care of girls, many of whom are left without parents and who are subjects for continual protection and care."

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

BURKE, motherless son of John Denby, had lived the first twenty-one years of his carefree life in the company of his over-indulgent father. Returning from college, he met Helen Barnet, orphan daughter of a village storekeeper in Vermont. After an acquaintance of scarcely two weeks, the young man surprised his father with the announcement of his engagement, and a month later a letter came to John Denby in which his son told him that he had already married Helen Barnet. At once the father cut off Burke's allowance, leaving him only his wages as apprentice in the Works. The first two months of the honeymoon were spent in finding a home and trying to live in a flat on $15 a week. This problem was soon solved to Helen's satisfaction by means of an account at the grocery, which she opened without Burke's knowledge. The explosion came with the first batch of grocer's bills. Burke then instructed Helen in the mysteries of bookkeeping, and at the same time tried to polish the manners of his rustic wife. One evening Burke received a visit from his friend Dr. Gleason, a traveler and archeologist, and Helen did her best to entertain their guest; but her efforts only served to mortify her husband and accentuate the gulf that separated her from the refined society in which he had been reared. The same thing happened when Burke, in response to an invitation from his father, took his wife to visit the Denby mansion. A difference of opinion as to the baby's name widened the breach which the baby's coming should have healed. One evening a distressing accident led to a violent quarrel, and Burke went to his father's house to sleep. While there his father laid before him a plan to take a trip with him to Alaska, leaving Helen and the baby to visit her old hime, and giving her a check for ten thousand dollars.

A BOTTLE OF INK

THERE was a tense silence. Burke's face plainly showed the struggle within him. A moment more, and he spoke.

"Dad, I'll have to think it out," he temporized brokenly. "I'll let you know in the morning."

"Good!" If John Denby was disappointed, he did not show it. "We'll let it go till morning, then. Meanwhile, it can do no harm to look at these, however," he smiled, with a wave of his hand toward the maps and time-tables.

"No, of course not," acquiesced Burke promptly, relieved that his father agreed so willingly to the delay.

Half an hour later he went upstairs to his old room to bed.

It was a fine old room. He had forgotten that a bedroom could be so large—and so convenient. Benton, plainly, had been there. Also, plainly, his hand had not lost its cunning, nor his brain the memory of how Master Burke "liked things."

The arrangement of the lights, the glass of milk by his bed, the turned-down spread and sheet, the latest magazine ready to his hand—even the size and number of towels in his bathroom testified to Benton's loving hand and good memory.

With a sigh that was almost a sob Burke dropped himself into a chair and looked about him.

It was all so peaceful, so restful, so comfortable. And it was so quiet. He had forgotten that a room could be so quiet.

In spite of his weariness, Burke's preparations for bed were both lengthy and luxurious—he had forgotten what absolute content lay in plenty of space, towels, and hot water, to say nothing of soap that was in its proper place, and did not have to be fished out of a baby-basket or a kitchen sink.

Burke did not intend to go to sleep at once. He intended first to settle in his mind what he would do with this proposition of his father's. He would have to refuse it, of course. It would not do. Still, he ought to give it proper consideration for dad's sake. That much was due dad.

He stretched himself luxuriously on the bed (he had forgotten that a bed could be so soft and so "just right") and began to think. But the next thing he knew he was waking up.

HIS first feeling was a half-unconscious but delightful sensation of physical comfort. His next a dazed surprise as his slowly opened eyes encountered shapes and shadows and arc-light beams on the walls and ceiling quite unlike those in his Dale Street bedroom. Then instantly came a vague but poignant impression that "something had happened," followed almost as quickly by full realization.

Like a panorama, then, the preceding evening lay before him: Helen, the crying baby, the trailing ink, the angry words, the flight, dad, his welcome, the pleasant chat, the remarkable proposition. Oh, yes! And it was of the proposition that he was going to think. He could not accept it, of course, but—

What a trump dad had been to offer it! What a trump he had been in the way he offered it, too! What a trump he had been all through about it, for that matter. Not a word of reproach, not a hint of patronage. Not even a look that could be construed into that hated "I told you so." Just a straightforward offer of this check for Helen, and the trip for himself, and actually in a casual, matter-of-fact tone of voice as if ten-thousand-dollar checks and Alaskan trips were everyday occurrences.

But they weren't! A trip like that did not drop into a man's plate every day. Of course he could not take it—but what a dandy one it would be! And with dad—!

For that matter, dad really needed him. Dad ought not to go off like that alone, and so far. Besides, dad wanted him. How his voice had trembled when he had said, "I don't think you know, boy, how your old dad has missed you!" As if he didn't, indeed! As if he hadn't done some missing on his own account!

AND the check. Of course he could not let Helen accept that, either,—ten thousand dollars! But how generous of dad to offer it—and of course it would be good for Helen. Poor Helen! She needed a rest, all right, and she deserved one. It would be fine for her to go back to her old home town for a little while, and no mistake. Not that she would need to spend the whole ten thousand dollars on that, of course. But even a little slice of a sum like that would give her all the frills and furbelows she wanted for herself and the baby, and send them into the country for all the rest of the summer, besides leaving nine-tenths of it for a nest-egg for the future. And what a comfortable feeling it would give her—always a little money when she wanted it for anything! No more of the hated pinching and starving, for he should tell her to spend it and take some comfort with it. That was what it was for. Besides, when it was gone, he would have some for her. What a boon it would be to her—that ten thousand dollars! Of course, looking at it in that light, it was almost his duty to accept the proposition, and give her the chance to have it.

But then, after all, he couldn't. Why, it was like accepting charity; he hadn't earned it. Still, if hard work and anguish of mind counted, he had earned it twice over, slaving away at the beck of Brett and his minions. And he had made good—so far. Dad had said so. What a trump dad was to speak as he did! And when dad said a thing like that, it meant something!

Well, there was nothing to do, of course, but to go back and buckle down to work—and to life in the Dale Street flat. To be sure, there was the baby. Of course he was fond of the baby; and it was highly interesting to see her achieve teeth, hair, a backbone, and sense—if only she would hurry up a little faster, though. Did babies always take so long to grow up?

Burke stretched himself luxuriously and gazed about the room. The arc-light outside had gone out and dawn was approaching. More and more distinctly each loved object in the room was coming into view. To his nostrils came the perfume of the roses and honeysuckles in the garden below his window. To his ears came the chirp and twitter of the bird-calls from the trees. Over his senses stole the soothing peace of absolute physical ease.

ONCE more, drowsily, he went back to his father's offer. Once more, in his mind, he argued it—but this time with a difference. Thus, so potent, sometimes, is the song of a bird, the scent of a flower, the shape of a loved, familiar object, or even the feel of a soft bed beneath one.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

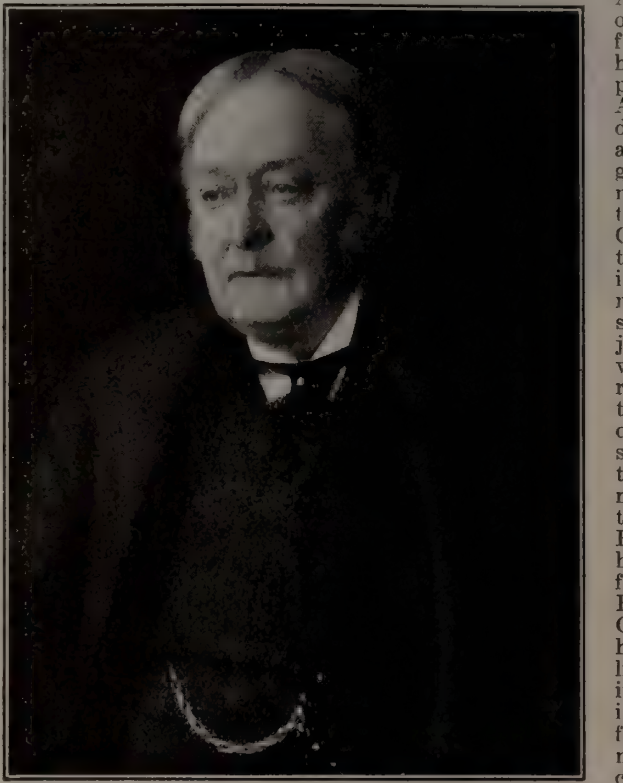
GERMAN CHANCELLOR APPROACHES PEACE. In a speech to the Reichstag on May 15, the Imperial German Chancellor, von Bethmann-Hollweg, briefly reviewed the military situation and Germany's relation to the neutrals; but made no definite statement regarding peace aims, as some had predicted he would do. He said: "The supposition which has recently arisen that some differences of opinion existed on the peace question between us and our allies belongs to the realm of fable. . . . But in the discussion of our war aims, the only guiding line for me is the early and satisfactory conclusion of the war. Beyond that, I cannot do or say anything."

Concerning the Allies, the Chancellor said, "Even to-day I see no readiness for peace on the part of England or France; nothing of the abandonment of their excessive aims of conquest and economic destruction. . . . Does any one believe, in view of the state of mind of our western enemies, that they could be induced to conclude peace by a program of renunciation?

"It comes to this. Shall I immediately give our western enemies an assurance which will enable them to prolong the war indefinitely without danger of losses to themselves? Shall I tell these enemies: 'Come what may, we shall under all circumstances be people who renounce; we shall not touch a hair of your head. But you want out lives—you can, without risks, continue to try your luck'? Shall I nail down the German empire in all directions by a one-sided formula which only comprises one part of the total peace conditions, and which renounces successes won by the blood of our sons and brothers and leaves all other matters in suspense? No, I will not pursue such a policy. . . .

Turning to the Russian situation, the Chancellor said: "As regards our eastern neighbor, Russia, I have already recently spoken. It appears as if new Russia had declined for herself these violent plans of conquest. Whether Russia will or can act in the same sense on her allies, I am unable to estimate. Doubtless England, with the assistance of her allies, is employing all her efforts to keep Russia harnessed to England's war chariot. If, however, Russia wants to prevent further bloodshed, and renounces all violent plans of conquest for herself; if she wishes to restore durable relations of peaceful life side by side with us, then surely it is a matter of course that we, as we share this wish, will not disturb the permanent relationship in the future and will not render its development impossible by demands which, indeed, do not accord with the freedom of nations, and would deposit in the Russian nation the germ of enmity. I doubt not that an agreement, aiming exclusively at a mutual understanding, could be attained.

BRITAIN MAY BUY BREWERIES. In a special dispatch to the New York Times from London on May 12, it was stated that the British government had practically decided to buy up the whole of the drink trade of the country. It was stated that "the cabinet and other members of the government were in favor of the policy of state purchase, state control and local option in other words, a popular vote on prohibition after the nationalization of the drink trade." It was also said that the prohibitionists opposed the measure, advocating confiscation; that the economists were against it because it meant the purchase of an enterprise in order to destroy it, and that the liquor trade itself wished to be left alone; also that temperance feeling in England was not strong enough to carry national prohibition, while Scotland, which will vote under the Scottish Temperance Act in 1920, was strongly in favor of prohibition.



Joseph H. Choate, lawyer, statesman, citizen
January 24, 1832—May 14, 1917

MR. CHOATE DIES. Joseph H. Choate, nephew of Rufus Choate, member of an illustrious line, citizen of New York, American patriot and former ambassador to England, died at his home in New York at 11.30 P.M. on May 14. In spite of his eighty-five years, Mr. Choate headed the committee appointed by the mayor to welcome the French and British commissions on their visit to New York, entering into the work with the enthusiasm of a renewed youth. He spoke on Friday night, May 11, at a great banquet to the Allied commissioners in his old power and with his old eloquence. Although accustomed in these later years to appear seldom in public, his appearances in this last week of his active life were almost daily. This strain upon his physique brought on a sudden end through heart-failure. Mr. Choate was born in Salem, Mass., January 24, 1832, graduating from Harvard in 1852 and from law school two years later. He came to New York shortly after his graduation. He soon became a partner in a law firm which later took the shape of Evarts, Choate and Beaman. For many years Mr. Choate gave himself uninterruptedly to the practice of his profession, early taking first rank and appearing in some of the most famous of cases until the latter half of the nineteenth century. It was through Mr. Choate's mastery of military details that General Fitz-John Porter was cleared of charges arising out of the retreat at the Battle of Bull Run, and was restored to his rank. Mr. Choate made the argument against the income tax in 1894, took a prominent part in the trials of the Tweed Ring, and was prominent in the Credit-Mobilier case. Mr. Choate never held public office by election; but represented the United States as ambassador to the court of St. James from 1899 to 1905, succeeding John Hay. During his ambassadorship he was able to bring the two nations to a much better understanding of each other. He proved himself a diplomat of the highest rank, and is said to have had more friends among statesmen abroad than any American since Franklin. In 1907 he was ambassador and first delegate to the International Peace Conference at The Hague, Holland, where he made the force of American opinion felt, and helped to place America definitely among the great signatories to the Hague Convention, fighting for many measures of justice to which representatives of the old world sovereignties were not ready to agree. Following his return from The Hague, Mr Choate had taken little active part in the affairs of the nation except for occasional public addresses.

RUSSIA WILL EXTEND RAILS. A representative of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation stated on May 13 that the corporation had received large orders from the Provisional Government in Petrograd for steel rails and other railway material. It was stated that the Russian government planned the construction of sixty new railroads to open up various districts in Russia, and that fifteen of these had been financed; that a commission was coming to the United States to buy 2,000 locomotives and 40,000 freight cars, and that the entire equipment for these railroads, to cost nearly $1,000,000,000, would be purchased in this country.

TO FLOAT THE LIBERTY LOAN. The last day for receiving subscriptions to the Liberty Loan being June 15, plans were formulated for a great campaign for the sale of the bonds to cover the full month preceding. Old-fashioned popular rallies were organized, and the campaign bureaus of both Republican and Democratic parties were asked to furnish orators to help in rousing the public to enthusiastic participation in the funding of the government's great enterprise. Secretary McAdoo planned a trip to the principal cities of the Middle West, and plans for the cooperation of banks and bankers were perfected. It was announced that several of the five-and-ten-cent-store organizations had offered to install special subscription booths in their stores.

THE SENATE DEFEATS CENSORSHIP. The Senate on May 14 passed the Espionage Bill by a vote of 77 to 6 after having defeated the press censorship clause by a vote of 48 to 34. The Senate also defeated the amendments previously incorporated in the bill by which the use of grain for the manufacture of liquors would have been restricted, and rejected also an amendment intended to curb speculation in food products. The bill was sent to conference. Although food gamblers and speculators were referred to in the debate as "pirates and robbers," senator after senator declared himself opposed to any attempt to muzzle the press.

ARMY RAISED TO WAR STRENGTH. On May 14 President Wilson approved completed plans for the expansion of the regular army to the full war strength of 293,000 men. Forty-five new regiments of infantry, cavalry and field artillery were authorized. On May 13 the strength of the army stood at 176,545, which is 116,455 less than the full war strength. At the rate estimates were being made, army officers expected the full number to be enlisted by June 15.

BRITISH FOR PEACE LEAGUE. A meeting of 1,200 representative men, including clergymen and members of the Houses of Lords and Commons, held in London on May 14 under the auspices of the League of Nations Society, Viscount Rice presiding, enthusiastically endorsed the plan for a league of nations to enforce peace for which former President Taft has been the American sponsor during the past two years. General Smuts and the Archbishop of Canterbury proposed the resolution, which read in part as follows: "It is expedient in the interest of mankind that some machinery should be set up after the present war for the purpose of maintaining international right and general peace, and this meeting welcomes the suggestion put forward by influential statesmen in America for the forming of a union of free nations for the preservation of permanent peace." Thunderous applause was reported to have greeted Lord Buckmaster, who, in supporting the resolution, advocated the admission of Germany to the proposed league, saying: "This league of nations will fail unless Germany is admitted into it. If she is excluded, it would be nothing but a league against Germany, in which case I see no prospect for the world but the unending darkness of night." General Smuts said: "If a hundredth part of the thought given to this war were given toward peace, there never would be war again. I believe a passion for peace has been born of this war which will prove greater than any passion for gain or conquests."

AMERICAN DESTROYERS AT WAR. It was announced on May 16 that an American torpedo boat destroyer flotilla had safely crossed the Atlantic, had reached Queenstown on May 4, and was in active service in the war against submarines. It was reported that the flotilla convoyed the liner Adriatic, and there were vague rumors of an active brush with undersea craft.

ARMY BILL PASSES SENATE. By a vote of 65 to 8 the Senate on May 17 accepted the conference report already accepted by the House on the Army Bill. The bill went to the President on May 18 for his signature. The chief provisions of the bill as passed provided for a selective draft system for men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty; for the increase of the regular army to maximum war strength and the drafting of the National Guard into Federal service; for the raising by conscription of an initial force of 500,000 men with additions of 500,000 as deemed necessary; for the raising, if the President sees fit, of four divisions of volunteer infantry, thus permitting the carrying out of the project which would send Roosevelt to France; for the increasing of the pay of all enlisted men, and for the prohibition of the sale of liquor at or near army training camps.

To Solve the Irish Problem. Premier Lloyd George on May 12 sent a letter to John Redmond, proposing a settlement of the home rule question either by the granting of home rule to Ireland, excluding the six counties of North and East Ulster, or, if that proved impracticable, by a convention which should be representative of all Irish parties. Mr. Redmond, after consultation with his associates, replied that he did not consider the exclusion of any part of Ireland feasible, but that he and his colleagues would be willing to enter such a convention.

Pershing Goes to France. Coincidentally with the signing of the army bill it was officially announced at the War Department that Major General John J. Pershing would be sent abroad at the head of a division of the regular army as soon as possible. It was also announced that the President would not avail himself of Mr. Roosevelt's offer to raise volunteer divisions of men not subject to the draft, because "to do so would seriously interfere with the prompt creation of an effective army."

Fragments of News. President Wilson on May 15, at a White House conference with members of the Senate and House Agricultural Committees, emphasized the imperative necessity for prompt action upon food control legislation. Three bills are before Congress, one providing for a food survey and for methods to stimulate production, another providing for a Controller General of food supplies, and a third providing for preferential treatment of foodstuffs by transportation companies. . . . A three days' conference between Swedish, Danish and Norwegian ministers in Stockholm ended on May 12, and it was officially announced that the three countries would maintain a policy of impartial neutrality. . . . Ninety-two Russian exiles left New York on May 14 for home, going by way of the Transcontinental Railroad to the Pacific Ocean and TransSiberian Railroad. The expense of transportation was borne by the new Russian government, at whose invitation the refugees were returning home. All of them were former revolutionists. . . . It has been learned that the shot from the American steamship Mongolia did not sink the U-boat at which it was aimed, but destroyed the periscope, smashed the top section of the conning tower, and killed the commander. . . . . Secretary Lansing announced on May 11 that there had been no agreement between the United States and the Entente governments in connection with peace, either written or unwritten, and no attempt had been made by the Allies to seek such an agreement, but that the question had never been raised.

Beyond the Horizon

A VIEW from a mountain peak is always inspiring. But no view either in the White Mountains or the Rockies is so enchanting as the spiritual view which will be opened up to the readers of the Christian Herald in the "Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," a series of articles by the Rev. James M. Gray, D,D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, the first of which, "The Seed of the Woman, or The First Promise of Redemption," will appear in next week's Christian Herald.

Next week the readers of the Christian Herald will also meet a Mexican patriot named Zapata, whom we had always thought a bandit and an outlaw. He will be introduced by Mr. Edward S. O'Reilly, whose story has been written from intimate personal knowledge.

Mr. Frank G. Carpenter will also tell in next week's paper of the great agricultural resources of the Greater South, touching especially the drainage projects and the sugar industry.

But these are only the special features. There will be the usual monthly message from Dr. Jowett, a message from the tabernacle, and each of the usual departments at its best.

The Progress of the War

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE situation in Russia has continued to be the center of attraction during the past week. On Sunday, May 13, General Korniloff, the commander at Petrograd, resigned his office. On Monday, May 14, the first break in the ministry of the Provisional Government took place when the Minister of War and Marine, Guchkoff, resigned, with the statement that he could "no longer share responsibility in the grave sin being committed against the country."

Tuesday, General Brusiloff, commander-in-chief on the southwestern front, and General Gurko, commander of the Riga front, resigned their posts. Milukoff resigned his portfolio as Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Russian cabinet on Wednesday, May 16. On May 17 the cable brought the news from Petrograd that the political crisis had been finally settled, "the declaration of the government's policy having been accepted with slight modifications, and signed by the representatives of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates; while, as a result of a meeting in Petrograd of the commanders-in-chief from all the fronts except the Caucasus, Generals Brusiloff and Gurko had withdrawn their resignations. Reports of further resignations are refuted by the definite announcement that all the commanders have decided to remain at their posts." Thus, the dispatch adds, "the crisis in the army, which formed an alarming accompaniment to the political crisis, has been averted." General Alexieff, commander-in-chief of the Russian armies, is quoted as making this statement: "I feel assured that under the new coalition government it will be possible to conduct military affairs in a more energetic manner." Representatives of five different Socialist groups have been taken into the cabinet, which, with A. F. Kerensky, who assumed the war portfolio, will make a total of six of these groups sharing in the government.

The British report of the operations of the submarines during the week ending May 13 in the war zone around the British Isles is as follows: Vessels over 1,600 tons sunk, 18; under 1,600 tons, 5; fishing vessels, 3. Last week, 24 vessels over 1,600 tons, 22 under, and 16 fishing vessels were reported sunk, so that this week's figures show a marked decrease, particularly in the number of the smaller vessels destroyed. The Italians report a loss in the same week of two steamers under 1,900 tons and several smaller vessels.

On the Austro-Italian front on Tuesday, May 13, after a violent bombardment, the Italians opened an offensive against the Austrian positions on the eastern bank of the Isonzo River from Tolmino south. The Italians state that this offensive has carried them across the Isonzo River, north of Gorizia, and that they have captured and occupied the village of Bombrez, on the east bank of that stream. Farther south, their center, after taking the villages of Zagora and Zagornilla, carried the ridges of Mounts Sueco and Vodice to the east. Still farther south, their right wing made progress on the western slopes of Mount Santo, while to the east of Gorizia the heights north of Tivoli were taken by storm, and they held this advantage in spite of insistent Austrian counter-attacks. All told, the Italians state that over 4,000 prisoners, some artillery and much war material have fallen into their hands.

The Austrians claim that the Italians have been repulsed everywhere, except to the north of Gorizia, and claim to have captured 2,500 Italians.

The important event of the week on the western front was the transfer of General Petain by the French government from the position of chief of staff to commander-in-chief of the armies of France, General Foch, who won such brilliant laurels in the first two years of the war, succeeding him as chief of staff, while General Nivelle, the late commander, was relegated to a subordinate command. The combination of Petain and Foch appears to be a good one, the only uncertain element therein being Petain's capacities as a field commander, compelled to take the offensive and defensive, as circumstances may require. Foch's appointment as chief of staff is an unqualifiedly good one. This general has undoubtedly heretofore shown himself the best strategist the Allies possess.

It is difficult to describe the fighting on the western front during the past week, for the reason that during the whole period the active portion of the line whereon the fighting has been severe has swayed to and fro, as one side or the other gained the advantage momentarily, in very narrow limits. On the British front, the fighting has concentrated around the village of Bullecourt, south of the Scarpe River, and the end of the week finds the antagonists in much the same positions they occupied at the beginning, though in the meantime this village has changed hands several times.

On the French portion of the front, the fighting has been very violent from Laffaux, directly north of Soissons, along the Chemin des Dames road to Craonne, and thence to Auberive in Champagne, but here also no advantages of a serious character have been won by either side.

The outstanding feature of the fighting of the week is the stiffening of the German defensive.

The President Proclaims Conscription

PRESIDENT WILSON, on May May 18, signed the army bill and at once issued a proclamation calling upon all persons liable under the act to register for service on Tuesday, June 5. The proclamation first recited sections five and six of the act of Congress which provide for the registration of "all male persons between the ages of twenty-one and thirty, both inclusive," which establish the machinery for this nation wide listing of man power and which fix penalties for evasions of the law and continued as follows:

"Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, do call upon the Governor of each of the several states and territories, the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia and all officers and agents of the several states and territories, of the District of Columbia and of the counties and municipalities therein, to perform certain duties in the execution of the foregoing law, which duties will be communicated to them directly in regulations of even date herewith.

The next two paragraphs provided for the registration of persons liable to registration who might be sick or temporarily absent from home and then the President having covered the details of this unprecedented draft called the whole nation to service in these words:

"And I do further proclaim and give notice to all persons subject to registration in the several states and in the District of Columbia, in accordance with the above law, that the time and place of such registration shall be between 7 a. m. and 7 p. m. on the fifth day of June, 1917, at the registration place in the precinct wherein they have their permanent homes.

Those who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day here named are required to register, excepting only officers and enlisted men of the regular army, the navy, the Marine Corps and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, and officers in the Officers' Reserve Corps and enlisted men in the enlisted Reserve Corps while in active service. In the territories of Alaska, Hawaii and Porto Rico a day for registration will be named in a later proclamation."

"The power against which we are arrayed has sought to impose its will upon the world by force. To this end it has increased armament until it has changed the face of war. In the sense in which we have been wont to think of armies, there are no armies in this struggle; there are entire nations armed. Thus the men who remain to till the soil and man the factories are no less a part of the army that is in France than the men beneath the battle flags.

"It must be so with us. It is not an army that we must shape and train for war: it is a nation. To this end our people must draw close in one compact front against a common foe. But this cannot be if each man pursues a private purpose. All must pursue one purpose.

"The nation needs all men, but it needs each man, not in the field that will most pleasure him, but in the endeavor that will best serve the common good.

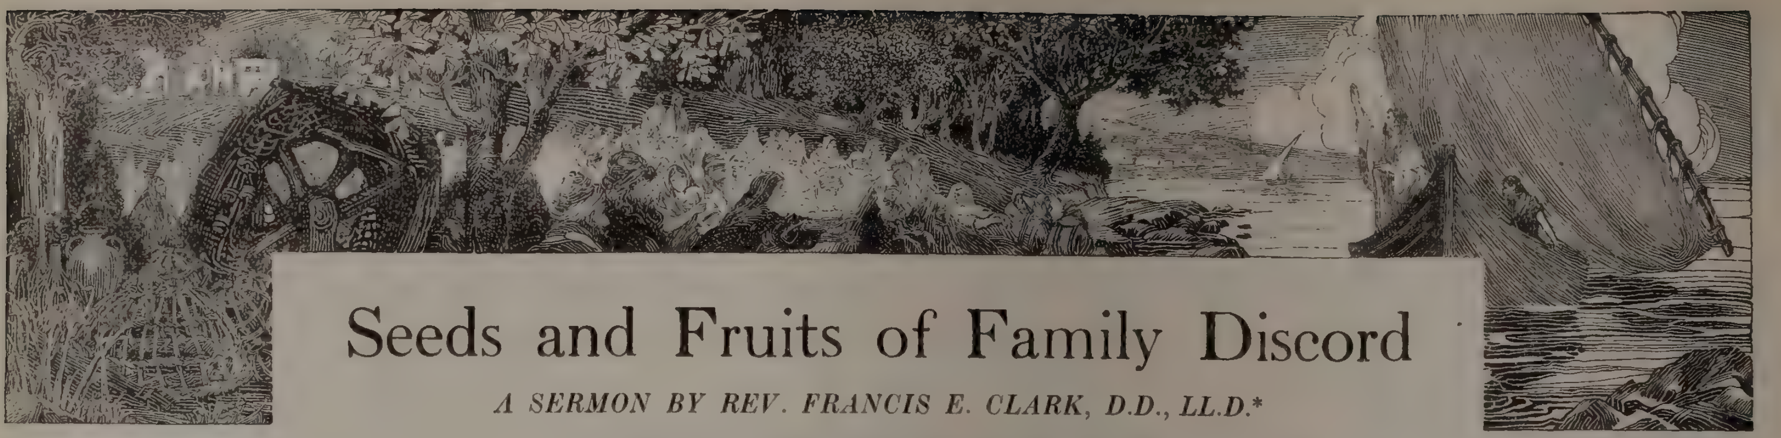
"Thus, though a sharpshooter pleases to operate a triphammer for the forging of great guns and an expert machinist desires to march with the flag, the nation is being served only when the sharpshooter marches and the machinist remains at his levers. The whole nation must be a team in which each man shall play the part for which he is best fitted.

"To this end, Congress has provided that the nation shall be organized for war by selection; that each man shall be classified for service in the place to which it shall best serve the general good to call him.

"The significance of this cannot be overstated. It is a new thing in our history and a landmark in our progress. It is a new manner of accepting and vitalizing our duty, to give ourselves with thoughtful devotion to the common purpose of us all. It is in no sense a conscription of the unwilling; it is rather selection from a nation which has volunteered in mass. It is no more a choosing of those who shall march with the colors than it is a selection of those who shall serve an equally necessary and devoted purpose in the industries that lie behind the battle line.

"The day here named is the time upon which all shall present themselves for assignment to their tasks. It is for that reason destined to be remembered as one of the most conspicuous moments in our history. It is nothing less than the day upon which the manhood of the country shall step forward in one solid rank in defense of the ideals to which this nation is consecrated. It is important to those ideals, no less than to the pride of this generation in manifesting its devotion to them, that there be no gaps in the ranks.

"It is essential that the day be approached in thoughtful apprehension of its significance and that we accord to it the honor and the meaning that it deserves. Our industrial need prescribes that it be not made a technical holiday, but the stern sacrifice that is before us urges that it be carried in all our hearts as a great day of patriotic devotion and obligation, when the duty shall lie upon every man, whether he is himself to be registered or not, to see to it that the name of every male person of the designated ages is written on these lists of honor."



Seeds and Fruits of Family Discord

*A SERMON BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT—Gen. 37 : 18-28.

THERE are no causes for misery more common than, and none so distressing as, family discord. The closer the ties that bind, the greater the chafing may be and the sorer the wound that this chafing makes. The sweeter the fruit, the sourer the vinegar; and when family affection turns sour, the product is worthy of the discord of the bottomless pit.

No better illustration of the causes and results of family discórd does the Bible afford than the story of Joseph, his father, and his brethren.

It must be admitted that Jacob was first, if not most, to blame for the trouble in his family. Not a very admirable character at best, he evidently had a good deal of the Old Adam to contend with, from the time when, with the connivance of his mother, he cheated his brother out of the birthright. He is an example of what the grace of God can make out of a very crooked stick. He was never made entirely straight, though vastly straighter than in his youth he gave promise of becoming.

His unfortunate disposition, or at least his lack of wisdom, was shown in the partiality with which he treated his son Joseph. By disposition he was evidently the son of his mother. The same trait appeared in the character of Rebekah, whose partiality for Jacob over Esau embittered the dying hours of her husband Isaac, and involved Jacob in such a tangle of lying and fraud.

"Israel loved Joseph," we are told, "more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age; and he made him a coat of many colors. And when his brethren saw that his father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him."

Whether we take this literally and believe that Jacob cared eleven times as much for Joseph as for any one of the eleven brethren, or only that he preferred him to any other, makes little difference. A slight preference shown for any one child in a modern family is enough to cause misery untold.

HOW many children today grieve over the preference of parents for a brother or sister! The less favored one is not so winsome or pretty, perhaps, or he finds it less easy to express his affection; and in secret, though too proud to tell his sorrow, he grieves over this partiality, and comes to think at last that he has no chance to make his way in life in comparison with his more favored brother.

Nothing is more foolish than the exhibition of such partiality. Indeed, it is almost criminal. It is apt to render the favored one conceited and toplofty, and to depress and mortify and sour the less attractive. It is gratifying to know that often the affection of father and mother is poured out more lavishly on the sick, the crippled, the ill-favored; but when the reverse is the case, family quarrels are sure to follow.

Jacob showed his partiality for Joseph by his gift of the coat of many colors, and doubtless in many other ways. Daintier food, perhaps, fell to Joseph's portion, with more comforts and less work; and when the older brethren were sent off to lead the rough and dangerous shepherd life in the wilderness, Joseph stayed comfortably at home, his only task being to find out news concerning his brethren.

We can scarcely wonder that his brethren "hated him and could not speak peaceably unto him." What a picture of family jars does this verse paint! Nagging and reviling, hateful words and looks, sneers and mocking, are all suggested by it. The folk of Palestine have a vocabulary of abuse today richer than that of almost any other land. Doubtless it was so in Jacob's time. They can curse a man's eyes and nose and teeth, they can curse his ancestors for six generations back, and his children's children's children.

Joseph, too, was in part to blame for the family discord. In early life, flattered by his father's preference, and conscious perhaps of being of finer mold than his rough and boorish brothers, he put on unconscionable airs. His conceit colored his dreams even, which he did not have sense enough to keep to himself. His was the sheaf to which all the sheaves of his brethren bowed down. He was the one to whom the sun, moon and stars made obeisance.

Even his partial father rebuked him for this exhibition of conceit. His nickname became "The Dreamer," and many a bitter laugh, springing from a heart of hate, did his brothers indulge in when they spoke of "The Dreamer." And when they saw him coming over the hills to Dothan to seek them, their sarcastic word of greeting was, "Behold, this dreamer."

Though their provocation was great, the brothers were, after all, the most to blame for the family tragedy. Things might have gone on for years longer with only bickering and reproaches and heartburning and hatred, and with no outbreaking crime, as in so many outwardly respectable families today. But the opportunity met the rancorous hatred of the brothers, and they conspired together to kill the favorite.

THE graphic Bible story makes it easy for us to picture the scene. The petted youth, the dreamer, draws near. wearing his gorgeous raiment, a beautifully embroidered tunic, such as the Beduins wear today when dressed in their best. The shepherd brothers are clad in rough sheepskins, not unlike the modern shepherd in some parts of the East.

Their very clothes emphasized the difference between them and whetted the edge of the hatred of the older brothers. "Come, let us kill him," said one. "We will dip that fine coat of his in a goat's blood and send it back to the old man, and tell him that an evil beast has torn this precious son of his in pieces. He won't dream any more."

One of the brothers, a little more merciful than the rest, proposed to drop him into a deep pit, hoping to rescue him afterward But Providence sent along an Ishmaelitish caravan that way, and for a beggarly sum Joseph was sold to the passing travelers.

What momentous events hinged on that passing caravan! The saving of Joseph's life was only a link in a chain of events that affected the history of mankind for centuries, which indeed affects our lives today,—the salvation of Egypt, as well as of Jacob and his sons, from a direful famine, the enslavement of their descendants for hundreds of years, the ultimate peopling of Palestine by the Hebrews.

But our theme has to do with the family life of Jacob's sons, and not with the history of the Israelites. We can easily trace the course of the quarrel which almost ripened into murder. Partiality, wrangling, conspiracy and intended fratricide were the seeds and fruit of this evil tree.

Every family quarrel contains some of these hateful seeds and may bear such hideous fruits.

I am glad that the future story of Joseph relieves this dark picture. Age sometimes hardens and sours the disposition, but sometimes it softens and sweetens it. In the case of Jacob and his sons, it seems to have had the latter effect. They grew to be better men as they grew older. Their consciences apparently never ceased to trouble the older brothers. They ascribed the troubles that came afterward to their dastardly act in selling Joseph. Jacob never ceased to mourn his favorite son, and his fatherly affection was evidently deep and abiding.

At last Joseph had an opportunity to take a glorious revenge. During all the years of his obscurity in the palace and in prison, he kept a warm place in his heart for his old father, and bore no ill-will toward the brothers who had treated him so ill.

"Is the old man, your father, yet alive?" he asks with trembling voice and eyes so moist that he dared not eat with his brothers in the palace lest he betray himself. He heaped Benjamin's plate with a fivefold portion, showing the same partiality for the youngest brother that his father had shown for him, but not with the same disastrous results. For the older brothers had been chastened by their afflictions, and starved into humility, and did not resent the favoritism shown to Benjamin. They groveled at the feet of their unknown brother, the great premier of Egypt, bowing before him as his dream predicted, and he completed the conquest by forgiving and loving them, and falling on their necks with kisses, and giving them afterward of the best of the land.

Thus ended this bitter family feud. We could scarcely have expected such a sequel.

THE sequel to the feud in Jacob's family points to the only remedy for all such quarrels. It is spelled l-o-v-e, and it is described more beautifully than in any other literature in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians.

Love may suffer long, but it is kind, and will sooner or later bring to an end every quarrel, because it envieth not the looks or the prosperity or the blessings heaped upon another. If Joseph's brethren had had something more of this grace in their hearts, they would not have been angry at Jacob's partiality, or envied Joseph's good fortune.

Love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up. If Joseph had had more love, he would not have told his foolish dreams, or vaunted himself over his father and mother and brothers.

Love doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not its own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil. Love would have prevented Joseph from unseemly behavior and his brethren from being so easily provoked with the young dreamer, and they would have had no such evil thoughts of murder about him.

Love beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never faileth. Such love, even in small measure, would have led Jacob's sons to bear with their younger brother, to believe and hope that years would bring him wisdom, and it would have enabled them to endure his supercilious conceit.

What a divine remedy is love for curing family discord! It is the only one. Such quarrels, unless love ends them, will be likely to grow more and more bitter until they end in the divorce court, as they have done so often, or possibly in murder and the murderer's cell.

Let us pray in every family circle, at every family altar, for the love that is kind, modest, well behaved, generous, gentle, that hopes and believes all good things about another; the love that never faileth.

The Spirit of Pentecost

SUNDAY in Jerusalem! In an upper room disciples of the Nazarene had gathered to pray, to plead. to wait for the promise of power. Ten days now had they tarried. They pleaded the promises, they supplicated the throne of grace, they trusted and believed; and now, on this blest first day of the week, "when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance."

Hear the story of a vision: I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day. Whilst meditating upon the great gift of God, a Presence filled the room, before whom my spirit was hushed into an holy awe. The presence touched me, and my weakness was changed into power. He breathed upon me, and new life did my soul receive, and the inspiration of the Divine was imparted. He spoke, and this was his message: "I am the Spirit of Pentecost. I am the promised Power. I bear the seven-fold gifts of God to the church. I give to the prophet vision; to the worker, power; to the singer, song! By me Peter preached and won three thousand on the Day of Pentecost. By me Saul of Tarsus became Paul the Apostle. By me John wrote, and Mathew, Luke and Mark. By me the church in all the ages, when down, was raised up; when darkened, was lighted; when depressed, was made glad; when weak, was empowered; when dead, was revived. By me revival fires have been kindled and showers of blessings bestowed upon the parched ground, and I have made glad the wilderness and solitary places!

"By me Luther spoke and shook the gates of Rome; by me Knox thundered; by me Whitefield preached on fire the Gospel that waked England and America; by me Edwards brought on the Awakening, and John Wesley the great Revival, and by me Charles Wesley sang the songs of Redemption. By me Asbury, and Lec, and Abbott, and Baker, and Finney preached the evangel that saved America from infidelity and shame and waked it to righteoeousness. By me Moody preached and Sankey sang a Gospel that touched a nation, bound up broken hearts, and converted multitudes. By me thousands of church altars have glowed with the sacred fires. I put zeal into the worker's heart. I give prayers to the saints and promises to the meek.

"I am the Spirit of Pentecost come to impart anew the seven-gifts of God. I do for the church what health and learning cannot. I give to the pulpit what eloquence does not—Power, Power, Power! and when I am come to the church, and to the pulpit, and to the Christian, I will convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment!"

Earthen Vessels

SUNDAY, June 3. II Cor. 4:7. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." There is something wrong when the vessel robs the treasure of its glory, when the casket attracts more attention than the jewel which it bears. There is a very perverse emphasis when the picture takes second place to the frame, and when the ware which is used at the feast becomes a substitute for the meal. There is something deadly in Christian service when "the excellency of the power" is of us and not of God. Such excellency is of a very fleeting kind, and it will speedily wither as the green herb, and pass into oblivion.

Our God delights to put his treasure into unobtrusive vessels. He loves to put his bounty into modest hands. How often he manifests his power in conditions which excite surprise in all who see it! We cannot explain how such power appears in such simplicity. It seems as if such a radiant flame should be in a more ornate and attractive lamp., Moody's excellency was in an earthen vessel, and many doctors of divinity have wondered at the strange association. There are thousands of men who are better speakers than Moody, and there are thousands who are better singers than Sankey; the vessels are more chaste and striking, but the treasure is not there in overwhelming glory!

What mighty power God pours through the earthen vessels of plain and simple speech! He does not wait for eloquence. Indeed, there is a form of eloquence of which the Lord seems to be afraid, and he leaves it to fly by and "lose itself on desolate seas." And then again, what marvelous power is packed into broken prayers! The eloquent prayer may attract attention to itself, and we may admire the suppliant instead of reverently adoring the Lord; but the simple prayer, broken it may be by a hundred hesitancies, reveals the sacred force which takes the kingdom of heaven by storm.

And then how God honors simple and unshowy methods in the ministry of the Kingdom! The spectacular organization is just a splendid emptiness, while some quiet and unobtrusive fellowship is just laden with the excellent glory of the Lord. I think we are living in a time when the earthen vessel has become a costly exhibit. We like large things, showy things, sensational things, noisy things, while God still delights in the earthen things, and he still chooses "the things which are not, to bring to nought the things which are."

And so we must be prayerfully thoughtful at all times lest we appoint vessels to the service of the Kingdom which will absorb the glory which belongs to God alone. But to be thoughtful is not to be careless. Grace puts no premium upon shabbiness and disorder. We must not offer to the Lord that which costs us nothing. Our best and hardest pains must be devoted to getting rid of all that is theatrical, spectacular, and vainglorious; and we must present to the Lord a lamp which is clean and burnished, but which will not distract attention from the presence and glory of the Lord. The Eloquent Dead

MONDAY, June 4. Heb. 11:4. "He being dead yet speaketh." This, more than anything else, distinguishes man from the lower creation—the desire to be remembered after we have ceased to live. Man is the only monument-building animal. Look at the pyramids. Think of the Taj Mahal, the pearl mosque, the dream in marble, by which an oriental monarch sought to immortalize his love for his bride. There are other monuments than those built of stone. The poet lives in his poetry, the artist in his art. Truth is immortal. Martyrs may perish, but the truth for which they suffer is imperishable.

One of the best things about our human nature, fallen as it is, or failing to rise to greatness as it does so often, is that we cling with passionate persistence to the memory of the true, the beautiful, the good. Whose are the living names in history? Whose are the voices which still speak to us? Abel, Enoch and Abraham; David and Isaiah; John and Paul; Chrysostom and Augustine; Savonarola and Huss; Bunyan and Wesley. who are these? They are the eloquent dead. The most modern of them has long since passed from earth, but being dead, they yet speak. They speak of heroic faith, of loyalty to heavenly vision, of the courage of spiritual pioneering; of the utmost human devotion to the highest spiritual ends, of life on its highest levels, life lived far above mere self-seeking, life given unstintingly to the redemption of the race.

The words of the apostle are an appeal to us. "When these poor lisping, stammering tongues are silent in the grave" they may still speak. Shall they speak of God and of his Son, our Lord? They must, or the impulse to goodness imparted to us by the glorious company of the apostles and the noble army of martyrs can not be transmitted to our children and our children's children and to as many as are afar off. Death and Life

TUESDAY, June 5. Rom. 6:23. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Here is a pair of momentous contrasts: first, between death and eternal life; secondly, between wages and gift. The contrast relates to our final destiny. So far as man has the shaping of that in his own hand, that destiny is despair, destruction, damnation; for all that is contained in the word "death." To those who meet this fate it comes as the reward of labor performed. They worked for it. It is not inflicted on them as a foregone conclusion by God; it is man's own choice. "Why will ye die?" asks God with astonishment of the sinners whom he sees bent upon working out their own destruction with a zeal and persistency that were worthy of a better object. The lost will have none but themselves to blame for their perdition. Nor will they have reason to feel surprise because of their being lost; in the terrible light of an aroused conscience they will recognize themselves as the architects of their misfortune. When they quit this world they are mustered out like soldiers at the end of a campaign; they receive their pay, and that pay is death. Horrid wages, indeed; but horrid too was the service for which wages are rendered. The contrary of death is not a reward of merit, it is God's gift. It is freely offered to all. God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked should turn from his evil way and live. However, the gift of eternal life which God offers to sinners is not bestowed by a mere decree of God; it is conveyed to the sinner through an agent, Jesus Christ our Lord. He it is who earned the gift by his living and dying. He earned it not for himself but for the sinners whose place he had taken under the divine law. Wherever the record of his life-work is published, wherever men hear the holy Gospel of Christ and believe it, the self-appointed destiny of the sinner is reversed: instead of death, for which he had worked with all his might, he receives life, for which he had not worked at all. The Saviour and the Mother

WEDNESDAY, June 6. Isa. 66:13. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." One day Henry W. Grady left his editorial room and went to his old home to see his mother. His first words were, "Mother, I have lost my religion, and I have come back to you, where I first found God, that you might lead me to him again." She took him upon her knee and told him Bible stories, singing lullaby songs to him. She gave him his bread and milk at the table as when a boy; leading him upstairs to bed, she said, "Now pray the same prayer, 'Now I lay me down to sleep.'"

In the morning the son said, "It's all right, mother. I've found him again where I found him in my childhood." And with great joy he went away to his office work.

Are you a wanderer from your mother's Christ? Return to her and to him; go back to the starting place. Do you say, "She is gone to her heavenly home"? Then, in imagination, nestle again in her arms, weep at her knees, pray the little prayers of your childhood. Listen and you may hear the rustle of her angel wings still hovering over you, ministering as of old to your troubled spirits. See, she points you upward to the gates of the lost Paradise now open again to receive you; to the Christ, longing to cleanse you.

How happy you are when the abyss of sin separating you from mother and the Saviour is closed again, with you enwrapped in mother's affections and the arms divine! There is room in her mansion for you. E. W. C.

The Woodland Path

JUST a narrow path through a leafy dell,
Where the crocus blooms and the robins dwell,
And the echoed songs from the topmost trees
Are gently borne on the perfumed breeze;
And the laughing brook lulls the spirit wild
Till the scornful man is a trusting child.
Just a moss-grown path that is seldom trod—
But it leads to peace and the works of God!

Just a flowery path through a wooded vale,
Where no sordid things of the world prevail—
Where the heart is soothed by the sparkling rills,
And the silence awes and the freedom thrills;
And the mystic spell of the solitude
Fills the swelling breast with a hope renewed.
Just a winding path through a sylvan glade—
But it leads to the place where souls are made!

Walking in the Light

THURSDAY, June 7. I John 1:7. "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." John's favorite words are Love, Life and Light. He speaks of God as dwelling in light. Jesus Christ calls himself the Light. Men have been lights in the world—prophets, patriarchs, apostles, poets, sages—but their light has not been original; it has been derived from "the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

To walk in the light is to live holily, to have fellowship with God. They who have fellowship with God have also fellowship with all others who walk in the light. This is the communion of saints. What is the ground of that communion? The fellowship of mystery, of suffering and of common citizenship. These things unite all Christians, says a modern teacher: salvation from a common peril and devotion to a common Friend. C. C. A.

Christ in Us

FRIDAY, June 8. Rom. 6:11. "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead unto sin, but live unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." The great moral truth which the apostle wishes to drive home in this section of his Epistle is this: The life of believers is entirely bound up in Christ, even as their life with all its sins and all the fatal consequences of sin had become the life of Christ.

Christ, the immortal God and the sinless Man, died. Why must he die, when death is but the wages of sin? Because of our sins, as our representative and substitute, he died. As our proxy he also rose from death to live in the new spiritual state unto God. As we must count his death as our death, we must also count his rising as ours. "We are buried with Christ by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." The appeals of sin that come to us daily in a wicked world should get a response from us as little as from a corpse.

We cannot avoid seeing, hearing, feeling sin, but we cannot as redeemed sons and daughters of God become personally identified with sin. Our thinking and choosing, our loves and aversions, our action and inaction must be a standing protest against sin. "Reckon yourselves to be dead unto sin"—that is the logical conclusion which the apostle wants us to draw from the atoning death of our Redeemer. Our life is to be a Christ-life, Christ living in us, directing our thought and governing our will, and we living with him, for him, in him. Only in this way can a person realize the mighty import of the profession: I am a Christian. W. H. T. D.

Being Saved by Saving

SATURDAY, June 9. Dan. 12:3. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever." We are saved by faith in Jesus, but rewards are according to service. If we sow sparingly, we shall reap also sparingly. Every child of God may have an abundant entrance into the life eternal, or be saved so as by fire. Moses had respect unto the recompense of the reward, therefore he renounced Egypt for Christ. The greatest work of the Christian world is telling others of Jesus. This is our true ideal. Hitch your soul to a star by helping to save another soul. It is said that an old mountaineer always directed the stranger by saying, "Always take the upper turn in the road." So heavenly voices invite us to look up and lift up. As we see the resplendent gems studding the night with glory and hear them say "Come up higher, and shine among us forever," we reach out for another precious immortal to join us in the constellations of heaven for Jesus' sake, for his own sake and for your sake, whose reward shall be great.

Let us not be like those who may have crowns without a single star, but like those who have not a single star lacking in their crown. We shall not be like the unknown graves in a soldiers' cemetery, but well known, for each will shine with a luster all his own. Let us therefore run so that we may obtain an incorruptible crown, full of soul gems, growing brighter forever. E. W. C.

Our Ever-Living Heroes

IN the full tide of spring, at the height of glad nature's carnival of flowers and love and life, our nation comes to a solemn pause in the sacred presence of its heroic dead, and those of us who have inherited freedom and honor pay tribute to those who bought these blessings with their blood.

Memorial day may and ought to have a meaning beyond mere glory to the soldier dead. It celebrates and solemnly reaffirms from year to year a national act of enthusiasm and faith. It embodies in the most impressive form our belief that to act with enthusiasm and faith is the condition of acting greatly.

Stripped of the direct associations which give rise to it, this is a day when by common consent we pause to become conscious of our national honor and to rejoice in it, to recall what our country has done and is doing for us, and to ask ourselves what we can do for our country in return.

The great French soldier, DeLatour d'Auvergne, was the hero of many battles; and when he was killed Napoleon ordered that his heart should be intrusted to his regiment, that his name should be called at every roll-call, and that his next comrade should answer, "Dead upon the field of honor." Just so in the keeping of our nation are the hearts of many heroes; we treasure them in consecrated ground, and when their names are called we answer in flowers, "Dead upon the field of honor, but living in our hearts."

Not all the associations of this day are sad; some of them are triumphant, joyful. The funeral march becomes a pæan. Our heroic dead still live for us, and bid us think of life, not death—of life to which in their youth they lent the passion and the glory of the springtime.

Love an Opening Wedge

EXPERIENCE has shown in repeated instances that in those countries where relief work has been conducted by the Christian organizations of other lands, a great advance in spiritual interest has invariably followed. Wherever our own people have reached out hands of love and helpfulness in time of distress, that course has been the means of leading multitudes, after the pressure was over, to regard Christianity in a new and more attractive light. So it was in India, China and Korea, where the accessions to Christianity were amazing. Their people were drawn by cords of love and gratitude toward the religion which prompted the men and women of a distant land to succor them in their time of need. So it is today in a remarkable measure even in Japan. And we may look forward confidently to similar results from the great work of Christian benevolence that is now being carried on in Armenia and Syria, where American aid has been the means of saving hundreds of thousands from the fate which overtakes homeless populations in war time. In the expressions of love and gratitude that have flowed in upon us, we see the kindling of a new spirit of fraternal affection for the people who did not shut up their hearts in indifference, but took compassion upon them when they were in need.

Christian sympathy, practically expressed, thus becomes a key that unlocks the inner chamber of a nation's heart. Blessing rests upon the compassionate who take pity on those that are "ready to perish." Benevolence is not only wise missionary statesmanship, and the strongest kind of challenge from Christianity to the decadent religions, but it is the best kind of international politics and adds to the glory and honor of our nation. All of us should strive to make the good work as complete as possible by continuing to send help until the time of suffering is past. We can spare it, and should regard it as at once a privilege and a duty to go on to the end, completing the good work which has been so well begun.

Billy Sunday and the Ministers

EVANGELIST BILLY SUNDAY'S campaign in New York is now half-way through. From the start it has been phenomenal in attendance, in enthusiasm, and in the trail-hitting record. It has been especially picturesque in the use of language so vivid as to be almost livid at times, and the argot of the street has streamed through it all in a ceaseless torrent. But the evangelist has his own way of doing his work, and although he has been more sharply assailed and criticized than ever before, he has gone right on plowing big furrows in the dictionary and sowing the vernacular in artistic profusion, to the dismay of those who, when they listen to a sermon, prefer the prosaic kind.

Now, Mr. Sunday is frankly satisfied that slang is permissible as an aggressive weapon in fighting the devil and his works. At a big gathering of ministers in New York a few days ago, he is reported in the daily press as having explained his attitude in these characteristic terms:

"If my vocabulary is not as good as yours, I can't help it; I am putting up with the vocabulary I have. I just got down the old Gospel gun and hell has been howling ever since. I am not cranky, I am not arbitrary, not dictatorial, but I have been preaching as an evangelist twenty years and I have learned some things you don't know. The fellow that I am particularly anxious to get uses a vocabulary that is about one-third cuss-words, one-third obscenity and one-third slang or gutter words. I use the slang to get at this fellow. I learned my vocabulary in the street, and I know it."

This may well stand as an answer to the critics. And the best evidence that he gets the fellow he wants lies in the fact that some 36,000 trail-hitters have enlisted under the Christian banner up to date, and many more are coming daily. Religion, as he deals it out, may seem to some folks like a volley of baseballs, served with lightning speed at many angles; but the main point is that they hit the mark.

Among the ministers who heard the evangelist's explanation were some of the ablest in New York, and they saw the point and reckoned it well taken. Nobody desires to justify slang in the pulpit; but there is only one Billy Sunday, and his way of serving out hot shot to sin and convicting sinners, while it may shock some unduly sensitive minds, is the only way he knows that will reach "the fellow he wants," who is usually impervious to other kinds of argument. At all events, he has taught the pastors of New York and of many other places the value of life and energy and tremendous earnestness in the pulpit.

When Spring Smiles

SOMEWHERE there's an orchard covered with rosily white blossoms and touched with delicate perfume—an orchard where gnarled old trees have been transformed, over night, into a bit of heaven, almost. Somewhere there's an orchard far back from the road—the long road that folk call Life—so far back that not a bugle call, or the sound of marching feet, or a single drumbeat may be heard. Somewhere there's an orchard where butterflies are fluttering, like fragments of magic mist, through the air—where robin redbreasts call across a sea of pale color to their mates. Somewhere there's an orchard where one may lie on the soft green grass and, looking up through a lacework of branches to the blue sky, forget.

It's the springtime. Hurry and doubt and heartache and even the shadow of war cannot quite crush that glowing fact! It's the springtime, and there is an orchard—perhaps just back of the horizon line over the farthest hill, perhaps in the real country where Youth and May go hand in hand, perhaps only in the land of memory or the gardens of the heart; but there is an orchard where the robins and butterflies and blossoms (like babies, they are, pink little sleeping babies) wait for you.

Let's find that orchard! Spring comes only once a year, and smiles wistfully, and is gone. Let's make the most of the sweetest, shortest season by finding that orchard. And, lying on the ground under one of the great trees, let's forget that there is anything in the world but happiness, and vivid sunshine, and peace.

Finding God

THE greatest outcome of the world catastrophe is that it is bringing to men a new and absorbing conviction of the need of God. It is doing more than this. It is leading men who have been groping in moral darkness and doubt to find God and to give themselves voluntarily and unreservedly to his service. Still more, it is leading them to undertake the responsibility of bringing others to unite with them in setting up his kingdom in the hearts of men here and now.

This transformation and enlarged vision is not confined to the churches. It is found in all kinds and conditions of men, both in the church and out of it. It touches the heart and understanding of both the simple and the intellectual; for in spiritual perception—the soul being once awakened—all are on equal ground, prince and peasant, millionaire and day laborer, scientist and artisan, mistress and kitchen-maid. God is indeed no respecter of persons.

It will be a new world—a spiritually renewed and revivified world—which we live in, when the present troubles are overpast. The finding of God, the realization of our own helplessness in sin and the universal need of a Saviour, will make all things different. Even now the voices of multitudes are rising in intense appeal for a world-wide revival of faith, and a recognition of the divine sovereignty and of God's love and forgiveness.

This is the spirit that is now pervading the churches and multitudes among the unchurched. The great purgation will have burnt out the dross of skepticism and infidelity and shriveled up the theological vagaries that have led men astray in the past. It will be a chastened and purified world that enters on the new era—a world looking joyfully to human brotherhood, and in which love and toleration will take the place of hate and injustice.

The world needs a Saviour to clear up the tangles of life, to reconcile us to Him who is ready to welcome back the wanderers, to open wide the door of forgiveness which leads to new opportunities and nobler living. Already the church is bestirring itself and looking forward to the time when all the branches will be drawn together in a united effort to carry out the great work which their Founder designed. It can never again be the same thoughtless, heedless, blind, selfish, forgetting world of the past.

The Force of Ideals

HIGHER! It is a word of noble import. It is an impulse of tremendous lifting power. It lifts the souls of men from low and groveling pursuits to the achievement of high and great purposes.

In youth life stretches before us like a pleasant road running straight to the sun-kissed hilltop. With years must come more or less disillusion. The feathery palm-trees we saw in the distance may prove but a mirage, and the beautiful castles we seemed to see far ahead turn out to be only dead heaps of stones that we must laboriously surmount.

But we must not cease to day-dream. For life is such stuff as dreams are made of. Dreams are the stars of our destiny.

There is this difference between the great and the little souls of earth: the little soul, disappointed, ceases to dream; the great soul dreams on and makes his dream come true. Every great soul of man has had its vision and pondered it until the passion to make the dream come true has dominated his life.

It is only he who aspires highly who highly achieves. The world over, one's achievement depends upon aspiration far more than upon environment. If one's longing be zealous and soul-deep, it will express itself in action as naturally as a bird takes wing. It will cause to grow within one the qualities that bring success as it causes the plant to shoot upward toward the light.

Every Man in His Place

ONE good result of the war is that it has awakened the spirit of service in many in whom it had previously been dormant, if indeed it existed at all. There is no room for the sluggard, the time-waster, the loafer these days. The spirit of national service is aroused and there is a call for each and all of us, men and women alike, to be at our posts, doing the work for which we are best adapted and which in the long run will add most to the sum total of constructive national help. Each individual begins to feel a new purpose in life, that is to be served only by thought and skill and intelligent, unremitting effort. We cannot live the old, selfish life, doing all for ourselves. As citizens of the great Republic we owe it the fruits of our highest endeavors. The farmer in his furrow, the smith at his forge, the merchant at his counter, the business man in his office, all now have in view this national service, the outcome of which, while it may be sacrifice, yet becomes a pleasant duty and a material help. Get busy, then, and do "your bit"; though you may never see the trenches or shoulder a weapon, you can add to the efficiency of the nation's greatness by your inspirational energy, your productiveness, your hearty help in every good work that is going forward in your neighborhood, and that makes for public betterment and more rational living. This is the industrial, economic, constructive warfare that is behind the battle-front, but which supplies the sinews, stimulates the courage and assures the sustained morale of the men at the front. Don't be a cipher; be somebody; do something! Give your best to the cause, and the whole nation will be the better for it, yourself included.

St. Paul's Old Clock Gone

PEDESTRIANS on lower Broadway in New York were astonished the other day when they gazed at St. Paul's steeple and found that the old clock that had registered the passing of time for 119 years was no longer there. In its place there is to be a new clock of latest design. However, the bells which sounded out the hours since 1798 are not to be disturbed. The old clock, which was made in Clerkenwell, London, in 1798, had practically worn itself out. But it will be preserved as a curiosity in the church alongside the great spoked wheel which many sextons used in winding it. The ancients had no such devices as our modern clocks. They early learned to divide time into years according to the apparent motion of the sun among the constellations, into months by the swinging of the moon around the earth, into days by the light of the rising sun in the morning and the darkness following its setting in the evening. They marked the hours of the day with sundials and hourglasses. King Alfred is said to have observed the lapse of time by watching the gradual shortening of a lighted candle. Clocks something like those we have today have been known for nearly a thousand years. Gerbert, a distinguished Benedictine monk, made a clock for Magdeburg in 990 which was run by a weight. In 1286 there is the record of the clock-keeper of St. Paul's Cathedral, London; in 1290 Westminster had one, and one was placed in Canterbury Cathedral two years later. The great clock at Strasburg Cathedral was eighteen years in the making, from 1352 to 1370. Two hundred years later it was remodeled and reconstructed. What a strange story the old worn-out clock of St. Paul's on Broadway could tell if it had the languages, the laughs and sighs, the patient toil, the mad grasping after wealth of the multitudes of men and women who tramped the pavements below it; of the marvelous growth of the new nation just begun when it first took its place as sentinel, and of the growth of the little city to the second largest in the world; of the multitudes of eyes that looked on its face and that grew dim in death! The old worn-out clock is the type of the worn-out body that is laid aside. The wearing out of the body is thus referred to: "Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." (Eccles. 12 : 6, 7.)

Morally, Not Legally, Bound

IN a large city a firm engaged in importing silk hoisery and gloves failed for $30,000, and settled with its creditors at thirty cents on the dollar, and secured a legal discharge from further obligation. That was seven years ago. The senior member of the firm immediately went into business again, and surprised all his old creditors with an additional 12½ per cent. on his indebtedness, promising to continue the annual remittances till 100 cents on the dollar are paid. He is not legally liable for a penny, and yet he justly feels morally liable for it all. He is over seventy years of age, and said the other day to one who commended him, "Do not lose your courage if you lose your money. Courage and ambition are your successes." The old man's courage and ambition are splendid, but the real lesson he is teaching is that of common honesty. So many will do just as dishonest things as they can so long as they keep out of the penitentiary. So many do mean things within the law, who escape earthly penalties, but of whom the Judge will require a strict accounting at the last. The honest bankrupt was obeying this command: "Provide for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men." (II Cor. 8 : 21.)

Automobiles Supplant Yellowstone Park Stages

WHEN the portals of Yellowstone Park are thrown open for the 1917 season on June 20, the thousands of tourists who annually enter this playground of natural wonders will find a complete change in the transportation facilities of the park. More than 600 old stage-coaches, relics of pioneer days, will have been replaced by luxurious ten-and seven-passenger touring-cars. Announcement of this fact was made recently by the White Company of Cleveland, which is building 150 ten-passenger and 25 seven-passenger touring-cars for the Yellowstone Park Transportation Company. The supplanting of the historic stage-coach by motors is a part of the government plan to popularize the national parks and make the "See America First" slogan more impressive this year than ever before. By this new arrangement it will be possible for tourists, on a comparatively short visit, to see all of the geysers, terraces, canyons, waterfalls, cascades, glaciers and other points of interest. Special springs, pneumatic tires and deeply upholstered cushions are employed to insure easy riding. Comfort is further enhanced by the folding tops, which allow a full view of the scenery and at the same time furnish protection if needed. In traveling between the hotels in the park, a passenger's hand baggage may be carried on the car in which he rides, on special racks provided for this purpose. Although the Yellowstone was first opened to private motor traffic late in 1915, thousands of tourists in privately owned cars explored this treasure region last season. There are 400 miles of roads in the park. "The Greater Yellowstone" comprises 7,000 square miles. While motor vehicles have been a great factor in making all of the national parks more popular, the present installations are merely a beginning. Encouraged by their successful operation on the unimproved stage routes, the Department of the Interior, which controls all the national parks, spent large sums to make the roads smooth and safe, erected bridges of steel and concrete, and purchased equipment for road maintenance. The cars therefore have been instrumental in opening up and maintaining new channels of exploration. It is well to have the national, state and local playgrounds where the people may have rest, recreation and the mental and spiritual benefit that contact with nature brings. Christ recognized this need when he took his disciples into the wild solitude of nature for recreation and rest. "And he said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile." (Mark 6 : 31.)

Famine Tames Sheep

THE fierce winter and deep snows of Colorado made it impossible for the mountain sheep to secure food. Though the laws of the state do not allow them to be killed by hunters, they are still very shy. But, pressed by hunger and threatened with starvation, they came closer to the settlements. The citizens came to their relief, and great flocks of these sheep have come down to the edge of the city to get the hay and other food the people have provided for them. The kindly impulse that caused the citizens of Colorado to care for the starving mountain sheep was in literal obedience to this command, which Christ gave to Peter spiritually: "Feed my sheep." (John 21 : 17.)

Siam's National Library

THE king of Siam recently reopened with formal exercises the National Library, which has just moved into its new quarters. This library was established in 1881 by the children of King Mongkut as a memorial to their father. In 1904 it became the depository for the national archives of the kingdom. The library has three sections: one for religious literature in the ancient Bali language, another for the Thai or Siamese literature, and the third for foreign literature. Books, libraries, a general education, are necessary to the highest national life, more important even than the fertility of the soil or other elements of material wealth. Though there are traces of printing from blocks of wood, the ancients knew nothing of the art of printing as we have it now. They wrote their books on skins or papyrus and rolled them into scrolls for reading and safekeeping. In Babylon they had a library where these rolls were preserved. There is this mention of it: "Then Darius the king made a decree, and search was made in the house of the rolls, where the treasures were laid up in Babylon." (Ezra 6 : 1.

Saleslady 42 Years

PROBABLY the veteran saleslady of the United States is Miss Mary Hallam, who has had forty-two continuous years of service in Marshall Field & Co.'s store in Chicago. On May 6, 1875, the late Marshall Field employed her when the institution was a little drapery store, and on the forty-second anniversary Miss Hallam, who had sold laces to Mrs. Abraham Lincoln, Mrs. Ulysses S Grant and hundreds of other prominent women, was congratulated by scores of friends and old customers during the day. Her counter was a bower of flowers, among them forty-two huge "American Beauties." It is said that she has been such a careful student of human nature that by some psychological insight she is able to guess what a woman wants before she asks for it. In olden times, some nations gave women large liberty and opened the doors of business to them. One of the first converts on the soil of Europe was a saleslady, who has been immortalized by this record: "And a certain woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, which worshiped God, heard us; whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul." (Acts 16 : 14.)

Kind Act Brings $38,000

A YOUNG woman of Paterson, N. J., was visiting her sister at Dorchester, Mass., and went to the beach to take a swim. Coming slowly over the sands was an old woman. As the women were about to meet, the foot of the elder caught in an obstruction and she would have fallen but for the timely help of the other. The woman took a great fancy to the girl, and they became boon companions. One day the elder woman confided to the younger that she would remember her in her will, but she expected nothing more than some small remembrance. Hence she was surprised a few days ago to learn that her elderly friend had bequeathed her $38,000. There is a small string to the legacy, but this does not bother the beneficiary in the least, as she says the conditions will be easy to fulfil. She must not marry till she is twenty-five. If she counts her gift as a stewardship with responsibility to the Allgiver, then the legacy will be a real fortune, sure enough, and a blessing. The apostle advises those having money to be generous, to make good use of it from spiritual motives, "Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life." (I Tim. 6 : 19.)

When Jesus Comes

A Sermon Preached in the New York Tabernacle by Evangelist William A. Sunday *

TEXT—I Thess., 4 : 17, 18.

THE meeting here mentioned is to be the greatest meeting the Bible tells us anything about. There have been some wonderful meetings, but never has there been one to compare with this.

It was a wonderful meeting the children of Israel had on the shore of the Red Sea, after Pharaoh's host had been destroyed in the angry waters, and Miriam the prophetess, with her timbrel, led the people in singing, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." (Ex. 15 : 21.) And it was another great meeting they had at the foot of Mount Sinai, when the law of God was given to them amid thunders and lightnings and fire and smoke.

That was a great meeting, too, on Mount Carmel, when Elijah, the sturdy Tishbite, defied the prophets of Baal; and that was a great meeting where David danced before the ark of God as it was borne into Jerusalem.

It was a great meeting when Solomon dedicated the temple, and the glory of the Lord came upon the people. And those were great meetings that were held on the banks of the Jordan, when Jerusalem and all Judea went out to hear the man who dressed in camel's hair and wore a leather girdle, and lived on locusts and wild honey.

It was a wonderful meeting when Jesus preached the Sermon on the Mount, and another when he fed the multitude with five loaves and two fishes. And that was a great meeting on the day of Pentecost, when the Spirit came like a rushing mighty wind, and under Peter's preaching about 3,000 were converted.

All these were great meetings, and any number of others have been held, both in former times and in our own day.

But no meeting has ever been held anywhere or in any time, that could begin to compare in importance with the greatest of all meetings that is to be held when our Lord comes to make up his jewels.

That meeting is the one for which all others have been preparing the way. It will be the crowning meeting of all history. The purpose of all that has been done in this world up to the present time has been to prepare for that great meeting.

FROM Adam, mankind has been marching, step by step, up a grand stairway leading direct to that meeting. The call of Abraham was one step toward it, and Jacob and his twelve sons were another; the conquest of Canaan under Joshua another, and so on with every event in sacred history.

It was for this Jesus suffered on the cross to make atonement for sin. It was for this he arose from the dead and ascended into heaven, where he took his place at the right hand of the Father. It was for this the Holy Spirit came at Pentecost, and it was for this that churches have been organized and missionaries sent to the ends of the earth.

These things have all been done to prepare the way, and lead up to the meeting which is so graphically described in the text.

MANY have an idea the world will grow better and better until the coming of the millennium, and everybody will be converted, and you hear that stuff preached, but the Bible does not teach any such trash.

On the day before the flood there were no doubt many people who were sincere in thinking that the world was growing better, and yet it was so hopelessly wicked that God had to destroy it. Some of the men who married into the family of Lot may have made the same claim for Sodom, only a day or two before its destruction; no doubt Lot's wife was of the same opinion. On the day before the crucifixion there were men in Jerusalem who undoubtedly agreed with each other that the world was growing better. The world will grow worse and worse. "They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage until the day that Noah entered the ark and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted; they builded. But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed" (Luke 17 : 27–30). Lawlessness, vice and crime will increase; communism, nihilism, anarchy, adultery, divorce, graft, all will continue to grow until they will finally ripen into the Antichrist.

Many think and preach the millennium will be brought about by the increase of knowledge, culture, great discoveries, such as the gasoline engine, automobile, electricity, radium, liquefied air, wireless telegraphy, airships, etc. These have nothing to do with bringing the millennium. It is the personal reign of Christ that brings the millennium. Those who have been the greatest blessing to the world were filled with this hope—and preached it.

THE word of God was vitiated and neutralized by the traditions of men when Jesus first came, and that is very largely the trouble in present times. Instead of going to the Bible to find out what God says, the preacher is too apt to go to his books, to see what the great men of his church have to say about it, and all their preaching and teaching takes its color from the glasses the rabbis wear, just as was the case in the time of Jesus. The fact that Jesus was not recognized by the high-up authorities, but was rejected and crucified as an impostor, shows what a dangerous and deadly thing it is to accept the traditions of men rather than what God says about things. Too many who are now masters in Israel are as much in the dark as Nicodemus was. The truth is no harder to get at than corn on the cob, if we will first strip off the husk and shell it. We need to depend more upon the Holy Spirit and less upon our libraries, if we would preach so that those who hear us will also hear the voice of God in our message. It is not what Doctor This or Professor That has to say about it that settles the question, and settles it right, but how reads the Word? What does the Bible say about it? And what we need to do is to take the Bible as it reads, not as some big man says it means. Big men have been mistaken about vital things just about as often as little ones. The safest pilot is not the one who wears the biggest hat, but the one who knows the channel the best. We should let the Bible speak to us just as God means it should, without distorting it by the prejudices and vagaries of those who are always trying to put their own camel into it and strain out somebody's else's gnat.

* In delivering this sermon, which was furnished to the Christian Herald by Robert Matthews, secretary to Mr. Sunday, the evangelist introduced a number of variations, suited to his audience and conditions at the moment

Only Jesus and the Father know when the Saviour is coming again.

Yet the church today shows as little concern about his coming as his disciples did about his going away. All this is fully in accord with Peter: "There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, saying, Where is the promise of his coming, for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning until now?"

JESUS not only foretold his going away, but charged his followers to expect his return, and be ready for it: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. Therefore, be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

Every time we lift the communion cup to our lips we "do show forth the Lord's death till he come." There is no prophecy needed to be fulfilled before Christ comes. Jesus said: "The Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; then shall the end come."

I tell you that God is pretty wise as to who are going to hell and who are going to heaven. The sooner you get that through your head and don't try to sidestep Jesus, the sooner the devil will let go the strangle hold he has upon most of you.

Think of the delight of meeting and continuing with the other members of the Lord's body, who will then be as dear to us as the apple of our own eye. Think of being intimate with Peter, James and John, Andrew, Philipp and the others, and of hearing from them again and again all the incidents they witnessed in the life of Jesus.

Think of how precious it will be to live for a thousand years in this world with our blessed Master and be closely associated with him; with bodies that will not wear out or grow old, always in perfect health, and with faculties for enjoyment a thousand times higher than we possess now.

It will also mean to be richly rewarded for all we have ever done or suffered for the Lord. Near the close of his hard and strenuous life Paul said: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing."

IF we have a part in that meeting we shall escape the great tribulation which is to come upon all the earth as soon as the members of the body of Christ are taken out of the world.

A very chaos of crime and outrage of every kind will be turned loose. God will let the world and the universe see for a time what it will mean to live under the devil's rule, and will let those who pass through the tribulation see that the good they so long enjoyed was because of the presence of the good. Some of you people who throw your votes and influence in favor of whisky and all kinds of hellishness that go with it, may live to find out, in the bitterness of the tribulation, just what is meant by sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind.

The real truth is, that great event will not bring destruction to anything that is good, but will, on the contrary, introduce an era of the greatest progress and prosperity the world has ever known. The coming of Christ will bring the millennium—the golden age of man in this world, when the arts and sciences, and everything else that man ought to delight in, will flourish as never before, and never until Jesus comes will the knowledge of the glory of God cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. To say that the second coming of Christ is a pernicious thing to preach is the same as saying it would be a calamity for God to rule. It will be the culmination of the redemption of this world, and to say that it would put an end to all progress is as foolish as to say that putting the roof on a house would ruin it and throw the carpenters out of work.

Mr. Sunday preparing for his next skirmish with the enemy

There is nothing more clearly declared in the Bible than that Christ will come and reign on earth during the millennium, when all will be restored that was lost by the fall. Then, and only then, will God's will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. The scribes and Pharisees thought business was going to be endangered by Christ's first coming. The only business that will be hurt by the second coming of Christ will be the devil's business.

ALL signs point to the great event, some of which seem to me to be—

(a) Radical tendency to depart from the Christian faith.

(b) Prophecies fulfilled—the Gospel has been preached in every nation.

(c) The world-wide expectancy of his coming.

(d) Revival among the Jews. They are flocking to Jerusalem.

(e) The political unrest.

(f) Extreme views on questions of government.

(g) Concentration of wealth in the hands of the few.

If we have a part in that meeting, it will mean that we shall be here in this world with the Lord during the millennium—a thousand years—with the devil chained and cast out—not a saloon, gambling hell or brothel in the world, and everything just as we want it.

We are not told when Jesus will come, but we are told that his coming is sure, and we are charged to watch for it. How it would affect our lives and make hard things easy to bear if we could only do this and always be doing this.

If we were continually looking for the coming of Jesus we would be as careful to keep our lives as clean as you would be to have your homes clean if you were expecting company. The certainty of his coming would also be a constant source of comfort and inspiration to us, if we believed it to be near.

What an awful thing, then, to have the glorious privilege of living in this dispensation, with all that it means, and miss getting into the body of Christ by refusing to become a Christian!

The preacher owes it to his people to look into these things, that he may show them their great privilege, and warn them of the awful things that may come upon them, if they miss their chance and have to go through the great tribulation. The preacher who has never qualified himself to preach a sermon on the sure and certain coming of his Master, will have to answer for an awful breach of trust when he stands before him.

Do not think it for a moment. God's purpose can no more be kept back a minute than the heavenly bodies can be delayed a minute. In redemption, God is working by the clock as surely as in creation, and his chariot of salvation is not marked late a single minute.

"Come, Lord Jesus."

Past the Half-Way Mark

HE wasn't very old. Not in years. But his face was lined, his skin was drawn tight over his nose, his cheek-bones, and the angles of his jaw. His eyes were sunken and hollow and his mouth drawn, the lips quivering and colorless. His step was shaky, and the usher that brought him forward had difficulty in leading his uncertain steps toward the little opening in the platform where Mr. Sunday was reaching down with both hands to give his warm handclasp to each person in the fast-passing files of trail-hitters. It was a sad face, not because the man was sorrowful, but because it bore evidences of ability and goodness which had been nearly obliterated by the marks of that arch-ally of the devil—drink. He wasn't sober, but he was sober enough to realize that he was a sinner and to seek that salvation which Mr. Sunday had assured 22,000 people was the certain result of faith in Jesus Christ. He knelt by the front bench while three personal workers knelt with him, and they prayed with him as he cried for mercy through a flood of falling tears.

Who was he? Just a bum? Yes, a bum; but not just that. He had been a professor at a prominent Eastern college, but a little drink had led to more and to still more, and from good positions he had drifted to poorer, and from those to none, until he was an outcast and friendless. But not quite friendless, for Jesus Christ was still waiting for another prodigal's return; and he arose from his knees, sobered and saved.

THIS is just one incident. Mr. Sunday had preached upon "The Son of Man has come to seek and to save that which was lost." He had told the story of old Zaccheus, who had come down from the sycamore tree to greet the Saviour of men, and to take him into his home and into his life. He closed with the declaration: "If you are ever lost, it will be because you stumbled over the love of God into hell."

This was on the evening of May 17. The tabernacle was crowded beyond its capacity, and there was an especially long list of delegations, among which was one of more than 150 employees of the Christian Herald. In welcoming the Christian Herald delegation, Mr. Rodeheaver varied his usual happy expressions of welcome to pay a modest tribute to the Christian Herald, and to acknowledge the fine way in which it had supported the campaign in New York.

With Tuesday, May 15, the New York campaign entered upon its second half. The half way mark was passed Sunday, May 13, with 3,339 trail hitters.

Trail-hitting continued with a steady impetus during this week, the total exceeding 7,000 for the week, and as the meetings progressed the power of the Spirit of God was more and more manifest. On the night previously referred to, when the Christian Herald delegation was present, Mr. Sunday came upon the platform tired and worn. He has been working hard, throwing all that he has of physical strength into every sermon, and the strain is already beginning to tell. As he began to talk he was annoyed by slight disturbances in different parts of the tabernacle, and he stopped speaking to cry out, "Please help me. I am so tired I can hardly hold my head up." Yet, in a power greater than his own physical strength, he went through with more apparent vigor, if possible, than usual, driving home with direct and certain blows the salient points of the message which had been given to him for that night. He emphasized the fact that "the best time to be a Christian is now." Speaking of Zaccheus' attempt to justify himself, he said that he was "trying to make his goods act as a disinfectant for the way he got his money."

NEW YORK has been called the graveyard of church letters. People from all parts of the country, North, West and South, from towns large and small, where they have been taking a more or less active part in the work of the various churches, come to New York, rent an apartment, and forget to send for their church letters, or if they have them, leave them resting comfortably in their trunks. They go to church a few times, perhaps, first to one church and then to another, and because they do not feel settled as to their residence, they do not make themselves known; they join no church, and gradually they drift away from all regular observance of the means of grace. Careful observation of trail-hitters makes it evident that Mr. Sunday's campaign is going to result in a multitude of resurrections. Perhaps the greatest single effect of the campaign will be in the awakening of former church members, and in the reinvigorating of churches through the turning into them of a stream of enthusiastic people who have learned through the campaign the joy and the compensations of active service for the Saviour.

FROM ONE WOMAN TO ANOTHER

Conducted by MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"From the Ends of the Earth"

ONE letter begins:

"Have you ever been in San José? It is 3,800 feet above the sea level, built in what must formerly have been the crater of a great volcano. Mountains surround it on all sides, making a beautiful background for the squat, compactly built houses, chimneyless and varicolored. It is strange to see a brilliant blue house huddled close to a dwelling of rose or orange hue. Buzzards sit upon the corrugated roofs, looking speculatively around, or fly lazily about above the streets.

"The city is clothed with little green plazas, and the people come and go there all day; men with wide hats and women with beautifully embroidered silken shawls drawn closely about their shoulders. They are duskily beautiful, with their hair hanging loose or in long black braids. In the evening the band plays in the grandstand of the little plaza, and always the people walk about the park, listening to the strains and smilingly bowing to passing acquaintances.

"The market is large, with stalls where tropical fruits, vegetables, meats, curious baskets, calabash-cups and bowls are sold. Outside, the picturesque two-wheeled ox-carts pass, the sombreroed driver going ahead of the patient beasts, a wicked-looking goad in his careless grasp. These wheels are cut from solid mahogany logs and painted crudely but artistically.

"San José is proud of her Teatro Nacional, whose mural decorations and statues are the work of some of Europe's noted artists. She is proud, too, of her insane asylum, set back in amazingly beautiful grounds. It is said that every species of rose is planted here, with tropical plants in abundance. Many people go away absolutely cured, due to the effect upon them of such beautiful surroundings. A hurried glimpse of the hospital gives one the impression also of beautiful flowers, and of poor crippled mendicants—men, women and children—some with heads tied up, some with poor, helpless feet, but each ready with a smile, though it be a wan one.

"Outside the city is the Bosque de los Niños, left forever to the poor by a wealthy priest. It is never flooded; it never dries up; never do the weeds grow there. . . . It is blessed. Once a year the little Costa Rican children have what corresponds to our Arbor Day, and add more trees to the ones already growing so luxuriantly.

"Nearby is a coffee plantation, with hundreds of bushes, the blossoms yellow and dainty, with a delicate fragrance. In the yard of it coffee berries, placed upon flat concrete surfaces, dry in the tropical sunshine.

"Everywhere flowers grow luxuriantly, and American beauties and rare orchids may be purchased almost anywhere for a mere song. Although in the tropics, San José is marvelously cool, surrounded as it is by mountains upon whose summits the clouds perpetually sleep."

Another letter, from a South African mission school, tells a story:

"There was a little boy at our school—a child about five years old. We called him Tommie. Our next-door neighbor had a son about the same age, and the two children used to play together.

"The sun was just setting at the close of a lovely autumn day when the two households were thrown into a fearful state of commotion. The two boys had disappeared! No one had seen them since shortly after lunch. But the consternation was not of long duration, for just as the shadows of evening were closing around us we perceived two little forms approaching us, drawing a small wagon which contained something white. As they reached us we saw that the something white was a Bible.

"'Why, children!' I cried, 'how could you go away without telling us? You know that there are many Kafirs about—they might have stolen you and carried you away!'

"Tommy's reply surprised me. 'No,' he said, 'we thought about it before we started, and then we decided that if we took the little wagon and opened the Bible and kept it open in the wagon all the time, the Kafirs would not touch us!'"

And, from the Orient, comes this message:

"I have been a missionary doctor here in Persia for a little more than a year now. Of course I cannot even yet do very much, because of my imperfect knowledge of the language; so when I get too tired of studying I write answers to the letters that are so more than welcome to me. Many of them have been on the way four or five months. We are apt to have a feast or famine here, in regard to mail, and our newspapers almost always come in anything but regular succession. It is very confusing to try to read a continued story under such circumstances.

"But Persia is a beautiful country, and I am very happy here despite the vagaries of the foreign mail. Its people are very attractive and very worth while working for. There is a great deal of physical suffering, however, that is uncared for—partly from ignorance, partly because all false religions seem to produce an indifference to the agony of others. Only yesterday I made a trip over the mountains near us to a leper village, where I saw the most wretched and miserable people I ever saw, worse than I ever imagined. They live and die there, year after year, and no one cares at all."

The Grace of the Years

IT isn't necessary to tell the names of the two women who are pictured at the head of this column. Everybody knows Amelia Barr and Marion Harland. Thousands of women have been helped, cheered, amused, and comforted by their work: thousands are still being helped and cheered and amused and comforted. For Amelia Barr at eighty-six is still writing books and articles, and Marion Harland, though eighty-four years young, finds time to pause between dictating syndicate work to her two stenographers and plan a new serial story.

Growing old beautifully and gracefully is not a new idea—it's been written up before. It has been stated that old age can be as graceful and beautiful as any other age—just as autumn can be as lovely (though in a very different way) as young spring and the more vivid summertime. But Amelia Barr and Marion Harland have done more than grow old gracefully—they have grown old energetically and enthusiastically—so energetically and enthusiastically that new-comers to the literary field will do well to look to their laurels. They have grown old so youthfully that no one would dare call them old.

It is Decoration Day—the day when we of the present generation are wont to pause and look back smilingly through the warm sunshine of May. It is the day when we particularly reverence white hair and empty sleeves and dim eyes; the day when our flowers are laid on grass-grown graves. It is the day when we applaud bravery—the bravery that stood the test of a country divided against itself—the bravery that made our land a real group of United States

For that reason it is singularly fitting and appropriate that we do a bit of homage to two women who, by their tireless and always worthwhile work, have helped our country to be a homelike nation. Their books have given a broad land some common interests, common ideals and ideas—perhaps even some common inspirations. Reading and loving the same books helps to make a vast nation as friendly as a small community.

Amelia Barr and Marion Harland are soldiers, and as soldiers we should honor them with our flowers and our speeches and our respect. They are soldiers who have never had to prove their courage on a field of battle, who have never had actually to face the smoke and flame of a cannonade, but soldiers nevertheless, for they have fought gallantly with the most furtive, undefeatable foe in life—Time. They have fought and have been victorious!

Eighty-four and eighty-six years old! And still looked up to as authorities—geniuses. Amelia Barr and Marion Harland may well be proud of their victory!

DECORATION DAY

DECORATION DAY?
It never meant so much to me before;
It was the symbol of a time gone by—
Of heroes white of hair and dim of eye,
Who marched in honor of a long-past war. . . .
It meant the sound of bugles, sweetly high,
And nothing more.

BUT oh, last night,
There in the candle light,
You came to tell me that you, too, must go—
It seemed as if my heart-beats faltered slow
(As slow and weary as a muffled drum).
And though I tried to smile, the tears would come;
And through them, blurred, I saw the flag you wore
Upon your coat
The very flag those white-haired heroes bore
When they were young, like you, and marched away. . .
I tried to say
That I was proud and glad to know that you
Would help to keep the country clean, and true
To high ideals—but, oh, the very words
Caught in my throat!

AND so, when I see white-haired heroes come—
Old men with empty sleeves and halting tread.
Old men who take a tribute to their dead,
Whose tired pulses quicken as the drum
Throbs out its call—
I'll know the deepest meaning of it all,
The meaning that goes back across the years
To heart-aches, and to partings, and to tears

A friend from Japan writes:

"I was born in France, but when I was seventeen years old I went to live, with my family, in America. America was my home for about twenty-six years, but as my husband is a native of Japan we left the country of my adoption about twelve years ago and are now living in the town of Shimonoseki.

"Three of our four children were born in New York; our youngest child (a boy) was born here, over nine years ago. All of the children go to Japanese schools. Although I always speak to them in English, they answer in Japanese. They understand English, but do not speak it. English is taught in nearly all of our Japanese schools.

"You will be glad to know that my youngest daughter has just entered a newly built Christian school for girls, kept by American missionary ladies. I am glad that she will learn the ways of a land where I so happily spent my youth.

And a correspondent in war-swept Italy says:

"Today a company of troops is marching through Corso Umberto I. It is one of the most beautiful streets in Naples—not unlike your Fifth Avenue—but it isn't a very happy street just now. The windows of the houses try to look gay with their flags and flowers, but the sad faces of the people seem to blot out the light and color. Now and again a beautiful woman will throw a nosegay of blossoms from her little balcony to her special soldier. Her tears mingle with her gift.

"Passing under the gallery at the center of the street, many of the soldiers turn to wave their hands and call a last farewell. Their feathered hats (for they are Bersaglieri) catch the sunlight in flashes of bronze and green, and the steel tips of their Alpine stocks glitter with an almost blue light. It would be a wonderful sight if one did not watch it through a mist of tears.

"Naples is a beautiful city. Flowers—all sorts and shades—grow in the public squares, and there are many fountains that are really works of art. But scenery is of a second consideration now. For the war that has touched the world with bitterness is taking the bravest and best of Italy's sons."

For Women Who Garden

A SEED apron is easy to make and will be a great convenience. It can be fashioned (in ordinary size and pattern) out of gingham, percale, denim or any other strong material. On this foundation a row of pockets should be sewed, large enough to hold seed packets and the smaller garden implements.

One tired woman, who had to lift all water from a thirty-foot well, had a syrup tin or keg buried between each two bushes or vines—the cork only exposed. With a funnel she poured in water and corked the vessel. The water dripped for days, from pin holes at the bottom, refreshing the thirsty plant with no waste. She had the only fragrance and gay tints when the whole region was sunbaked and bare.

Rhubarb will grow along a shady fence where few things thrive or in a large henyard—birds do not like it. This crop makes marmalade better than berries, takes little attention, and yields often even in far Northern parts.

Little bells tied on cherry trees will scare off pilfering birds.

Kerosene, rubbed on the hands, will repel gnats and mosquitoes.

Vaseline on the neck and hands will prevent sunburn.

The prompt application of mud or scraped onion will relieve a bee or hornet sting.

In making a vegetable garden.

For the best light run the rows north and south; for the easiest cultivation run them the long way of the garden; to prevent soil washing run them across, not up and down a slope. If these rules conflict, compromise as best you can

Keep the taller plants at the north end, so that they will shade the others as little as possible. Keep together the crops that grow all season—parsnips, salsify, tomatoes, cabbage, parsley, etc. Keep together, as far as possible, the crops that call for similar distances between the rows, making the garden look better and its cultivation easier.

These rules are simple, but they will improve the appearance and the efficiency of your garden.

After all, might he not be making a serious mistake if he did not accede to his father's wishes? Of course, so far as he, personally, was concerned, the answer would be an unequivocal refusal of the offer. But there was his father to consider, and there was Helen to think of; yes, and the baby. How much better it would be for them, if he accepted it!

Helen and the baby could have months of fresh air, ease, and happiness without delay, to say nothing of innumerable advantages later. Why, when you came to think of it, that would be enough, if there was nothing else! But there was something else. There was dad. Good old dad! How happy he'd be! Besides, dad really needed him. How ever had he thought for a moment of sending dad off to Alaska alone, and just after an illness, too! What could he be thinking of to consider it for a moment? That settled it. He should go. He would stifle all silly feelings of pride and the like, and he would make dad, Helen, and the baby happy.

Which question having been satisfactorily decided, Burke turned over and settled himself for a doze before breakfast. He did not get it, however. His mind was altogether too full of timetables, boat schedules, mountain peaks, and forest trails.

That was going to be a dandy trip!

IT was later, while Burke was leisurely dressing and planning out the day before him, that the bothersome question came to him as to how he should tell Helen. He was reminded, also, emphatically, of the probable scene in store for him when he should go home at six o'clock that night. And he hated scenes. For that matter, there would probably be another one, too, when he told her that he was going away for a time. To be sure, there was the ten-thousand-dollar check; and of course very soon he could convince her that it was really all for her best happiness. After she gave it a little thought, it would be all right, he was positive, but there was certain to be some unpleasantness at first, particularly as she was sure to be not a little difficult over his running—er—rather, going away the night before. And he wished he could avoid it in some way. If only he did not have to go home—

His face cleared suddenly. Why, of course! He would write. How stupid of him not to have thought of it before! He could say, then, just what he wanted to say, and she would have a chance to think it over calmly and sensibly, and see how really fine it was for her and the baby. That was the way to do it, and the only way. Writing, he could not be unnerved by her tears (of course she would cry at first—she always cried!) or exasperated into saying things he would be sorry for afterward. He could say just enough, and not too much, in a letter, and say it right. Then, early in the following week, just before he was to start on his trip, he would go down to the Dale Street house and spend the last two or three days with Helen and the baby, picking up his traps, and planning with Helen some of the delightful things she could do with that ten thousand dollars. By that time she would, of course, have entirely come around to his point of view (even if she had not seen it quite that way at first), and they could have a few really happy days together—something which would be quite impossible if they should meet now, with the preceding evening fresh in their minds, and have one of their usual wretched scenes of tears, recriminations, and wranglings.

FOR the present, then, he would stay where he was. Helen would be all right—with Bridget. His father would be overjoyed, he knew; and as for the few toilet necessities—he could buy those. He needed some new things to take away. So that was settled.

With a mind at rest again and a heart aflame with joy, Burke hurried into his garments and skipped downstairs like a boy.

His face, before his lips got a chance, told his father of his decision. But his lips did not lag long behind. He had expected that his father would be pleased; but he was not quite prepared for the depth of emotion that shook his father's voice and dimmed his father's eyes, and that ended the half-uttered declaration of joy with what was very near a sob. If anything, indeed, were needed to convince Burke that he was doing just right in taking this trip with his father, it could be needed no longer after the look of ineffable peace and joy on that father's face.

Breakfast, with so much to talk of, prolonged itself like a college spread, until Burke, with a cry of dismay, pulled out his watch and leaped to his feet.

"Do you know what time it is, dad?" he cried laughingly. "Behold how this life of luxury has me already in its clutches! I should have been off an hour ago."

John Denby lifted a detaining hand.

"Not so fast, my boy," he smiled. "I've got you, and I mean to keep you—a few minutes longer."

"But—"

"Oh, I telephoned Brett this morning that you wouldn't be down till late, if you came at all."

"You telephoned this morning!" puzzled Burke, sinking slowly into his chair again. "But you didn't know then that I—" He stopped once more.

"No, I didn't know then that you'd agree to my proposition," answered John Denby, with a characteristically grim smile. "But I knew, if you did agree, we'd both have some talking to do. And if you didn't—I should. I meant still to convince you, you see."

"I see," nodded the younger man, smiling in his turn.

"So I wouldn't go down this morning. We've lots of plans to make. Besides, there's your letter."

"Yes, there's—my—letter." This time the young man did not smile. "I've got to write my letter, of course."

CHAPTER X

By Advice of Counsel

HELEN DENBY received the letter from her husband at two o'clock by a special messenger.

Helen had passed a sleepless night and an unhappy morning. The surge of bitter anger which at first, like the ink, had blackened everything it touched, soon spent itself, and left her weak and trembling. Dorothy Elizabeth, after her somewhat upsetting day, sank into an unusually sound slumber; but her mother, all through the long night watches, lay with sleepless eyes staring into the dark, thinking.

Helen was very angry with Burke. There was no gainsaying that. She was a little frightened, too, at what she herself had said. In a soberer moment she would not have spoken quite like that, certainly. But it had been so hateful his asking if she called that a happy home! As if she did not want a happy home as much as he ever could!

To Helen, then, came her old vision of the daintily gowned wife welcoming her husband to the well-kept home; and all in the dark her cheek flushed hot.

How far short, indeed, of that ideal had she fallen! And she was going to be such a help to Burke; such an inspiration; such a guide, counselor, and friend! (Swiftly the words came galloping out of that long-forgotten honeymoon.) Had she helped him? Had she been an inspiration, and a guide, and a counselor, and a friend? Poor Burke! He had given up a good deal for her sake. (With the consciousness of that vacant pillow by her side, a wave of remorseful tenderness swept over her.) And of course it must have been hard for him. They had told him not to marry her, too. They had warned him that she was not suited to him, that she would drag him—— With a low cry Helen sat up in bed suddenly.

"Drag him down!"

HAD she dragged him down? No, no, not that—never that! She had been careless and thoughtless. She had not been a good housekeeper; and maybe sometimes she had been fretful and fault-finding, and—and horrid. But she loved him dearly. She had always loved him. It only needed something like this to show her how much she loved him. Why, he was Burke, her husband—Baby's father!

Quivering, shaken with sobs, she fell back on the pillow. For a few moments she cried on convulsively. Then, with a tremulous indrawn breath, she opened her eyes and stared into the dark again. A new thought had come to her.

But there was time yet. Nothing dreadful had happened. She would show Burke, his friends, everybody, that she had not dragged him down. From now on she would try. Oh, how she would try! He could see. He should find a happy home when he came at night. She knew more, now, than she did, about housekeeping. Besides, there was more money now—a little more—and she had some one to help her with the work. Bridget was really doing very well; and there was Mrs. Cobb, so kind and helpful. She would go to her for advice always. Never again should Burke come home and find such a looking place. Baby should be washed and dressed. She herself would be dressed and waiting. Dinner, too, even on Bridget's day out, should be all ready and waiting. As if ever again she would run the risk of Burke's having to flee from his own home because he could not stand it! He should see!

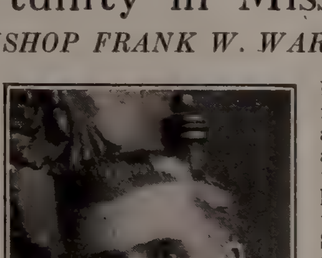
A New Opportunity in Missionary Work

By BISHOP FRANK W. WARNE

IN India there are two distinct forms of missionary service. One is among the non-Christian people of India, concerning which missionary people are fairly well informed. The other is among what is known in India as the "Anglo-Indian" or the "domiciled community." That is, part of the community has a mixture of European and Asiatic blood, and some are of pure European blood. This community numbers about half a million, and the people belong to what the non-Christians call the Christian community. They endeavor to live and dress as European Christians, and when they are poor, feel the poverty more than any other class I have ever known. They only receive small salaries, unless they are well educated, and they have to compete for existence with the clerking class of the Indian non-Christian population, which class lives as to house rent and dress on a scale impossible for a European. They are often despised by the pure European and the pure Indian, and are therefore between the nether and the upper millstones.

The fact that this community dresses and lives as European Christians impresses the three hundred million non-Christians with the fact that they are representatives of the great Christian religion, and to them they typify the teachings of the Christ. The sad fact is that many of them are far from being examples of Christ's teaching, and it makes it doubly hard for the missionary to reach the non-Christian people when they call the drunken and evil lives which many of this community live Christian. It will be a great asset to the eventual evangelization of India to have this community truly Christian.



Bishop Warne of India

There are many among them, however, who have proved themselves to have the possibilities of the best there is in both the Europeans and the Indians, and from among them we have secured a goodly number of very excellent missionary workers, both men and women. They, as a people, have special qualifications for such work, for they know the people, are accustomed to the climate, and can talk the language of India. To meet this peculiar need, our church in India has founded a number of orphanages, schools and churches, and we have been abundantly rewarded.

When the children of this community are deserted, as they often are, or left orphans, their condition is indescribable. I wish to present to your readers the case of thirty orphan or deserted boys, who can be fed, clothed and educated for thirty dollars a year for each boy. The whole cost is ninety dollars a year, and this possibility comes about in this way: First, the late Sir Robert Laidlaw, former president of the World's Sunday School Union, lived in Calcutta for over thirty years, and was a member of our church. He saw this need, and wished to help in what we were trying to do, and gave us the land, buildings and equipment for a splendid school in which to educate such boys. This provides a third of the cost. Second, the government gives another thirty dollars. So the foregoing provision makes it possible for a patron to complete the support of one of these boys of the Domiciled European Community for thirty dollars a year, or practically the same sum as would educate an Indian boy. There are thousands who are educating Indian boys, and I am deeply grateful for the privilege of telling the readers of the Christian Herald, who have supported so many Indian children, about these thirty boys, who have to compete in this uneven struggle, and who will stand for Christianity in India, for good or for bad, as they have the opportunity for an education and Christian training.

You will remember that I called upon you with reference to securing the support of some Anglo-Indian boys in Calcutta, and you consented to lend the influence of your paper, provided that the number would be small, and that the cost would be about that of a native boy. I noted both these conditions and on my return to India took the matter up, with the outcome outlined above. I know these are perilous times; but nevertheless I hopefully and prayerfully commit this story to your good offices.

I wish to send you India's most hearty thanks for past favors and all the wonderful things you have done for India. Here is a sample: You supported an orphanage in famine times under our mission in Rajputana. I have just made a visit there and find that we have eighty Christian workers out of that one orphanage, and they are largely caring for 15,000 Christians, converts from among the non-Christians, and are pushing the battle on. Is that not reward enough for the whole famine relief work?

I hope a number of these thirty boys I am asking you to help support will become ministers. What opportunities God does give his people!

. . . . .

Cat's Paw Fibre Soles.

You know the Heel. The sole matches it in quality.

It performs the function required as perfectly, but so differently.

It is not rubber—yet it has the flexibility, is as waterproof as rubber, noiseless, soft—a real cushion for the hard pavements of the street. It will not crack. It will not draw the feet. It will wear longer than leather.

Just say "Cat's Paw Soles and Heels" to your dealer. He will most likely suggest them.

Jesus Crucified

International Sunday School Lesson for June 10
John 19:16-30

The Climax of the Gospel Story

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE MUST never forget that the whole life of Jesus was just as sacrificial as his death. But his death is the great climax of his life, outstanding, typical of it all, and worthy of becoming as it has the symbol of his whole career. In it is seen the world's failure and misunderstanding at its worst, and at the same time the selflessness and intercessory love of the Master at its height.

Our first duty to the boys and girls in our classes is to give them some idea of the events which led to Calvary and then to help them to picture what took place there. Afterward the discussion of the meaning and value of the Cross is appropriate.

The Innocent Sufferer

From the middle of the night until full daylight Jesus had been dragged from one tribunal to another, from Annas and Caiaphas to the Sanhedrin, then to Pilate, the governor, from him to Herod and back again. In utter weariness, he was now put under the bloody scourge, as Pilate thought that might satisfy these implacable priests. That terrible ordeal over, the Roman reluctantly gave orders for the crucifixion, and Jesus, staggering under the cross, traversed the Sorrowful Way, Via Dolorosa, to the place outside the city walls called Calvary, the Hill of the Skull.

The hands were nailed to the crosspiece, the feet to the upright, and then cross and victim raised from the ground and fixed upright, the whole body resting on four wounds. The guard took up their watch, for hardy men lived for days of agony. Over the head was a tablet, inscribed with the crime. In Jesus' case Pilate ordered the legend, "This is the King of the Jews."

The Offended Dignitaries

The influential Jews were much incensed at Pilate's sarcasm. They tried to get him to change the title. But the Roman governor relished the implied insult to the men who had forced him to have the prisoner crucified. He would not change it.

All the cross of Jesus meant to these blinded men was a means of getting rid of a religious reformer who had criticized them. They thought nothing of his stainless life; they never considered his remarkable teachings, though never man spake as this man. They did not seek to find out the truth of his claims or their bearing upon the country and the world.

So it is today, alas. There are many influential bystanders who only ask Jesus to get out of their way.

"Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" Perhaps you have seen the great French painting illustrating this text of Lamentations. It is a picture of life, with so many rich and poor, wise and foolish, going on their way just as though Jesus Christ had never lived or died.

Is it nothing to you?

The Callous Soldiers

The second group in the picture as given by John is composed of a quaternion of Roman legionaries on guard beneath the cross of Jesus. The scene was not new to them. It was all in the day's work. In the most matter-of-fact way they set about dividing the garments of the sufferer, treating him as one already dead, with no further need of earthly goods. They were not intentionally brutal toward him, for one of them held up the sponge soaked in vinegar when the dying Saviour groaned, "I thirst."

There are unspiritual, materialistic people like this still. As you bid them look at the cross, they see only one of many misguided dreamers, one of many dupes of fate. That he incarnated God and rose to lead his disciples forever is folly to them. "Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness."

Yet the centurion who saw Christ die exclaimed, "Surely this was a righteous man." Even among the soldiers the cross awakened one.

The Little Group Who Cared

But there were those who cared. And first of all John says, "there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother." Mothers! Faithful even by the gallows. Faithful even when they do not understand the dreams that led their boys on.

Indeed, there she doubtless understood him better than ever before. She was crucified with him and raised with him to newness of life.

And at the cross was Mary Magdalene, one truly grateful soul. It is strange that tradition has misrepresented her as "the woman which was a sinner," because Luke plainly describes her as one of the women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities. Much had been done for her, and she was one of the kind who never forget.

Always there have been the utterly devoted people for whom Jesus has made life new and glorious. They never flinch at the shame of the cross. They believe and trust when the world sees only failure and loss. Though they may be poor and ignorant, the world needs them for the sake of their unconquerable faith.

And "the disciple whom Jesus loved" was there. According to the Fourth Gospel his personal friend, the one for whom he showed special tenderness and affection. Friendship is the salt of life, and the Bible is rich in classic examples. There are David and Jonathan, the poor youth and the rich prince who withheld nothing; Paul and Timothy, the veteran and the young lieutenant; and here a friendship that has been less studied: Jesus and John. We can profitably discuss the things that each found lovely in the other.

There can be nothing more beautiful and pathetic than the calm way in which Jesus so graciously and simply committed his mother to the care of his friend. Amid the frightful racking pains of the last hour, with the overwhelming sense of the world's blindness and sin upon him, the Lord shows his human love to the two who were dearest of all.

What Jesus Suffered

This leads us to consider what it was that Jesus suffered here. Physically it must have been frightful. And yet it was comparatively brief. Others have endured tortures more hideous and far longer for the sake of his cause. It is true that the finest natures have the greatest capacity for suffering, and yet we must look outside the realm of the physical for the supreme anguish of the crucified Messiah.

It is the spiritual burden and agony that has made the cross the eternal symbol of the vicarious sacrifice. He suffered the just for the unjust, and knew it. Blackly there surged over his spirit the mighty indifference of the mass of mankind toward the message of God's fatherhood, of human neighborliness, of spiritual joy and ministry and peace.

Human selfishness incarnated itself in the high-priestly party and seemed almost universal. Moral cowardice was summed up in Pilate, and in him too the brutal stupidity of earthly governments and rulers. The mocking crowd and the callous soldiery seemed a leering cartoon that joked at the proposal that men are sons of God.

For a brief time his spirit went completely under the cloud and tasted, there in the dark, the dregs of human bitterness and loneliness and despair. In solemn truth, he tasted death once for every man.

Why Jesus Suffered

Shall we venture to try to put into a few brief words the meaning of the Atonement? We must do so for our pupils, though great volumes have not made clear all that is involved.

Let us try to show the boys and girls that salvation through sacrifice is a law of life. Take the suffering and self-denial of a mother for her baby as your starting-point. Take the seamed face of Abraham Lincoln for a text and tell how he bore the burden of a nation. Speak of the soldiers dying for France.

These things make it easier to believe that the same principle runs up to God himself, who suffers for his erring children, who gives himself for his world that his world may be saved. Make the cross on Calvary the emblem of the heart of God the Father. Jesus suffered there to bring us home to God. Looking to Jesus, human hearts have been softened and redeemed throughout the ages.

The cross shows the cost of redeeming love in a sinful world. If our spirits yearn over our children we shall have to pay in anxiety and tears for their welfare. The cross stands for patience and unflinching sacrifice if we are to pierce through the barriers of human selfishness and pride and weakness in any community. Your true missionary is crucified for the erring, wayward peoples whose lives he would purify and uplift. Your genuine teacher has to be weak with the weak, and vicariously stoop to complete indentification with the ignorant blundering beginners in art or science.

So Jesus with all his marvelous powers was willing to identify himself entirely with sinful man, to be absolutely at one with us in all our need and loss, in order to raise us that we might be united with him. "Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor."

What saved us was not the suffering but the love back of it. Not the penalty and the shame, but the forthreaching invincible grace that was expressed in "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Jesus Crucified is the supreme manifestation to all time of God's love. He has a power that grips and holds.

The practical test justifies the cross as the central focus of redemption. It sums up the greatest words of Jesus in the Beatitudes. Not only so, but it shows up sin to be the hideous devastating thing that it is. Sin like yours and mine committed this outrage on the "gentlest spirit that ever breathed," and sin, even ours, is always insulting and thwarting God. No man ever really saw the cross of Christ and then glozed over sin as an indifferent matter.

It has redeemed the millions. Hearts are broken by the sight of him whom Jean Valjean calls "the Great Sufferer." Lives are changed.

But outward show and sentimental appeal are only the gateway to the mystery. Men are not saved till their sins are nailed to that cross. Men are not helped till they have surrendered to that mighty challenge to give themselves freely.

"The cross of wood on Calvary has never saved a soul.
The cross in thine own heart alone can cleanse and make thee whole."

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

How to Observe Children's Day

THIS day usually grips the children, the parents, and the community. It is usually observed the second Sunday of June. On account of its proximity to Flag Sunday, the two days are often observed together. Children's Day is often made a Sunday School Promotion Sunday, as it comes close to promotion day in the public schools. Some schools observe it as an annual school anniversary day.

Flag Sunday Features. The Bible texts as to patriotism may be given by classes and "America" sung. Brief talks can be made on "The History and Meaning of the Flag," "What the American Flag Stands For Here and Elsewhere," "How to Make the Flag Count for Most." If the attendance of one or more veterans or soldiers is secured, it will be interesting to break out a large flag through a string device, while all sing "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Mr. W. C. Short, superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday School at Los Gatos, California, makes much of the school's special days.

His Flag Day program included these recitations: "Our Flag," "The Grand Old Flag," "Our Glorious Flag," and as songs, "Banner of the Free," "Proud Flag of the Free," "The Battle Cry of Freedom," "Beautiful Flag of Liberty," closing with "Star-Spangled Banner" as a solo, and "America" sung by all. Write Mr. Short if interested in sources of songs or recitations. Write C. C. Overton, Coney Island, New York, for copies of "The Christian Flag" song.

Children's Day Decorations. Occurring as the day does in June, floral decorations should be a-plenty. If seeds and pots have been given the children some weeks in advance, the flowers in bloom may be brought in on Children's Day, and taken by the children afterward to the sick and shut-ins.

Program: Children's Day is usually celebrated in one of the church services. The Sunday School is given a preferred place. The pastor may give a natuer talk, show the Bible valuation of the child, and the kinds of service children can render to the Kingdom. The baptism of children is often deferred to Children's Day.

There should be school or department songs, recitation of memory texts or passages, and a few recitations of nature selections by the children. Some suggested school songs are "I think When I Read that Sweet Story of Old," "Fling Out the Banner," "'Tis Children's Day."

A missionary touch may be given the day by dressing children in the costumes of Japan, Korea, China, etc., and having them tell a few things about childhood in each field. Write Everyland, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, for copies of their magazine giving this information.

Service by the children: The children should be encouraged to write souvenir post cards for Children's Day to sick children in some city hospital or orphanage, and to make post cards and pictures into a small album for distribution to the sick, or to gather magazines for sick children. The superintendent should secure the names of these hospital children several weeks in advance of Children's Day.

Anniversary Day: If the day be given an Anniversary or Promotion Sunday cast, arches may be constructed decorated with the colors representing the school departments, and those promoted can pass through, receiving the certificate of recognition of their work. Each class or department group so promoted should contribute a class or department recitation of a hymn or Scripture memorized by them.
